

Mated to the Dragon Lord

She lusted after his gold and found a king

Alis Mitsy

The dragoness beat her wings harder against the downdraft of air, gravity threatening to drag her down to a gruelling death. In her mind's eye, she saw her body smashed upon the countryside, scales and entrails strewn, if the strikingly coloured blue specimen pushed herself just that little too far. It was a fine line to fly, between the point of exhaustion and pushing herself right up to that limit. Calibrid tilted her translucent periwinkle wings, soaring over the English countryside as life itself thrummed through her veins.

Danger made her heart sing!

Ah, the risk was worth it, the aching muscles and edge of terror. She bared her teeth in a feral snarl, a hiss rolling from his jaws. The prize would always be worth the trial in reaching it and she could not allow herself to slow her frantic pace. The glint of gold called her, an insistent nag at the edge of her mind, and she forced herself onward, eyes glazed over with raw, unbridled desire.

Calibrid rolled her head from side to side, shaking the line of spines down her neck from one side to the other. The sinuous curve and twist of her lithe, agile body kept her balanced in the air, tail streaming behind like a rudder. While her mind raced, her body took care for the real work for her.

A dragon's gold-fever was legendary for a reason, clawing at their hearts beyond all sensibility. They craved it more than anything else in the wide world, hoarding it jealously and guarding it from enemies, even at the cost of their own lives. Calibrid growled, the rumble trembling through her body as a lake flashed beneath her, sunlight reflected back onto her belly-scales. And one dragon had more gold than any of them. Unprotected gold. Or it may as well have been unprotected for all the threat the drake posed.

Modrecai. She growled, lust flickering into flame at the back of her throat. He had the gold. He had her gold!

Just what did that old drake think he could do with so much gold? She snapped her jaws and swung her head back and forth, questing for an answer that would not come. Sheep scattered far beneath her looming stomach, fearing her jaws closing around with bodies, plump with wool. They would not have been her usual prey, but she was hungry and swooped down to snatch one up in her claws, tearing its head off as she ascended again. Blood splattered the grass and the rest of the herd bleated in fear. She devoured the creature as she flew, griping all the while.

Every dragon with enough self respect to call himself such knew about Modrecai and what he had amassed. Taking a leaf out of tomes of old, he had set up residence in a castle – a ruin, yet a castle all the same. Once, Kenilworth castle had stood proud, looking out over a man-made lake that protected it on three sides. Yet it fell into disrepair as its owners fell ill of the times, lonely and forlorn in its isolation from the thriving bustle of London. Many years later, the tourists had tried to reclaim it for a time, barring the gates and demanding ‘money’ for entry. The first of them hadn't expected the dragon, Modrecai, to dive in, however, and let loose a devastating roar from the top of the gatehouse. That had been enough to scare away the majority of those setting up the site for viewing and those who tried to shoo him away at a later time were tossed into the river. Left to crawl home soaked to the skin, there had been few to challenge him.

Calibrid smirked. Humans were so easy to manipulate, too scared of them to ever pose a real threat to their survival. It was funny that they had even though to try to stand up to a dragon. Maybe the ones in the middle of the funny island weren't as used to their kind as the warier sort of human that lived in the mountains and foothills where dragons ruled? Either way, they seemed to have learned from their mistakes. Even an old dragon like Modrecai was difficult to evict, if he chose a home that they disliked.

She shivered. And that castle was where he stored his gold, ever last shining drop of it. Treasure was in short supply with humans choosing to put their faith in less inviting technology – no use to a dragon – and he had no doubt salvaged much from exhibitions and displays, thieving every single scrap he had gained. She had to admire him for his tenacity in breaking into so many of their stores, even if she was about to take it from him. The drake had certainly gone to a lot of effort to amass such a delectable hoard.

But she had no more time to think when the red-stoned castle loomed ahead.

Quickening her brutal pace, the dragoness tucked her wings in close to her sides and dived, claws stained with the blood of the sheep she'd devoured. Already she sensed it feeding strength into her muscles, blood pumping fiercely as she approached her target. Calibrid snarled, eyes narrowing into slits, a deafening roar building and building, heart pounding upon her eardrums.

It was now or never.

The walls of the castle crumbled to meet her and she bellowed, pulling up just above the stone to circle the courtyard, the broken down aviary that had no doubt let loose its feathered captives to roam the countryside. She snorted, letting the air fill her wings and let her float across his pathetic domain without expending further energy, a line of soreness aching across her shoulders.

For the first time since she'd begun her journey, a twinge of doubt caught her heart, but she brushed it away as swiftly as it appeared. It wasn't important. She would best him and easily at that. She ruffled the spines on the back of her neck, setting them shivering as her tail thwapped into a wall, knocking the uneven, rugged blocks clean off the top. She flushed with pride, warm beneath her scales as heat raced down her neck. Her strength was unrivalled – no dragon that she'd come across had ever been able to best her. Why, she was even one of the last fire-breathers alive. Did he breathe fire? As if he would ever be a match for her.

As if to further demonstrate her prowess, she spat a jet of fire across the highest tower, scorching the burned-orange stone black, air simmering with heat. She shook her head, scorn riddling her gaze as she searched for her opponent, the dragon who stood between her and a better life. The castle was a disgrace – and not a drop of gold in sight either. She snorted. What dragon would allow their home to get into such a state? And where was he?

The drake would know she was there – he simply had to. Even an old, half-deaf dragon would have sensed her presence. Like any other dragon, he would have to defend what was his, even if not rightfully so in her opinion.

She swung her head back and forth, searching for his scaly hide amongst the stones and torn up grass, claw marks gouged through the mud.

Where was the blasted beast?

Modrecai! She threw her thoughts forth, seeking the touch of his mind against hers as she circled the grounds. Show yourself, you coward! Are you not drake enough to face a dragoness in battle?

Oh, my dear, I am far from a coward.

She flared out her wings, pulling up and hovering in midair with her jaws daringly parted, a long, roiling hiss pouring out from between her formidable teeth. Saliva drooled from her maw as she hovered, scanning the grounds for the beast who had been the cause of so many sleepless nights for her, hoarding the object of her desire like he deserved to have any of it at all.

Calibrid stiffened. There. A hulking monster of a dragon, hunched low to the ground, skulked out of the castle itself, waddling from the courtyard with the spade-shaped tipped of his tail swinging oh-so-lazily back and forth. The crimson drake turned his blocky head skywards, meeting her gaze with one that seemed composed of embers, dwindling and diminishing in the remains of a fire that should have been snuffed out long ago. He sat back on his haunches, the main body of the ruined castle to his back and surveyed her. She snorted, eyeing him from head to tail. Did he think he was out for an afternoon stroll? Taking in the sights of his home? Maybe he didn't see her as a threat to him?

Well, whatever he thought, she'd show him that she was a force to be reckoned with.

Dropping like a stone, the dragoness slammed into the ground, legs bent to absorb the impact. The ground trembled and a flock of crows squawked from one of the towers, bursting forth in a cloud of black that quickly scattered, reprimanding her for daring to disturb their peace. She flicked her tail, standing up tall and raising her head proudly high. Let him look upon her and see just how fearsome she truly was!

The drake tilted his head, jaw hanging slack as if in an old dragon's smile. Up close, she could see how time had worn his red scales to a dull sheen, blunt claws pressing into the slick earth. She wrinkled her nose and turned away. Had he no pride? The drake should have taken himself back to the flame long ago.

Yet in his death would lie her life.

Calibrid, he purred, the tip of his tail flicking. The birds told me of your coming.

She snorted, shooting twin jets of flame from her nostrils. Had she really thought this male would be a trial for her? His appearance had been an illusion, the castle making him seem larger than he was – more imposing than he was. He was hardly any larger than she – a runt of a drake! Sinking back onto her haunches, she surveyed him with a critical eye, taking his measure as he took hers. Arrogance swayed her mind. She could take him. He was nothing to her. Nothing more than a stepping stone.

Calibrid's teeth showed in a draconian smirk.

Oh, did they now? I had no idea how the world spoke of my travels, my trials and my triumphs.

She snaked out her neck, eyes ablaze as smoke curled from her nostrils, telling of the fire just barely held in check.

Did they tell you of why I have come to you then, Modrecai? Did they foretell of your impending doom?

He chuckled and shook his head slowly back and forth.

So dramatic, little one... For it is not I who will be meeting an untimely end today.

Calibrid yanked her head back, eyes bulging. He dared mock her?

Is that a threat, you old corpse? She hissed. I can smell you simmering from her. Your body wants you dead as much as I do.

It was far from a threat, my dear, as I did not say that you will be meeting your end here today either.

Calibrid eyed him, suspicion riddling her gaze.

Then what, pray tell, do you imagine will happen here today? For I only see one outcome to our meeting.

The old drake's eyes glinted and Modrecai hauled his body to his feet, tail lifted for balance even on the ground. Calibrid followed suit, unwilling to remain relaxed when he was so obviously set on moving things along as swiftly as she desired.

Well? She demanded, slapping her tail into the ground when no answer was immediately forthcoming. Are you deaf as well as too old to make a proper stand against me? Where is your gold? Do you have any idea how far I've flown to reach you? To claim what is mine already?

He chuckled and shook his blocky head slowly back and forth. Her eyes tracked the motion, anger bubbling up in the lick of fire at the back of her throat.

You'll have to find it, he said, a wicked gleam in his eyes. I would have thought that such an astute young dragoness would have already found my hoard. Is that not what you came for? Or was it myself that drew your attention?

Calibrid hissed.

You hold none of my attention, drake, bar the fact that you stand in my way. It would do you well to move and find another home to lay your bones down for the last time.

Oh, but of course.

He leapt for the sky, claws digging into the ground as he shot up with shocking strength for such an elderly drake. His tail left a long furrow in the dirt as he took off, throwing his power into his wings as he shaped the air to meet his needs. The membranes billowed out, pushing him higher and higher as he wheeled, scales glinting in a sudden burst of sunlight as the sun peered out from behind a cloud. Perhaps it was interested in the show too. Calibrid's head wove back and forth, eyes narrowed to track him in midair, wings half-unfurled in her eagerness to join him. She would see his body smashed upon the castle walls when she was done.

Modrecai roared, flaring his wings out to let the sun shine through, casting a ruby glow over his domain.

This is your mistake, beautiful one, though it cannot be helped in one as young as you.

He spun and wheeled, tucking his body back on itself as if he was a hatchling again showing off outside the nesting cave. Calibrid hissed.

Ah, do not be like that, Calibrid, I commend you, truly. You have indeed travelled many miles in search of me. His gaze suddenly hardened. Yet you are assuming, my dear, that I am going to let you have my hoard without a fight!

She laughed, belching clouds of black smoke. Her sides shook, smoke coiling from her nostrils as she bared her fangs at the male circling above, tail swinging lightly to direct his flight as he gained height.

Do you really think you can take me, old one? I shall only hasten your demise.

His thoughts came with a touch of derision that stirred greater flares of anger up from the pit of her stomach.

I hardly think that shall be the case.

Fine, she thought, keeping her thoughts from touching his through their mental link. Let him have his fight. My victory will be all the sweeter for it, after all.

She snarled, hurling herself airborne and pummeling the air. Her tail sliced through the wind like a knife, yet it was much more difficult than she'd expected in her haste to climb, gaining inch after inch of height through a hard-won slog. The castle had few natural updrafts to help her out and her sides heaved for breath, neck strained and reaching for a wind that she could not claim. The drake smirked, watching her progress with a critical eye.

You lack the strength in your wings to pose a threat, he said, looking down over the castle with what she thought was a flicker of pride. You will not take what I have claimed, what I have earned through every one of my years.

Calibrid snapped her jaws, swallowing the gasps that threatened to spill from her jaws.

We'll see about that!

Before he could even think of forming a reply, she lunged for him, red maw gaping like a bottomless shaft straight down to hell. Her eyes blazed and she swore she tasted his blood spilling onto her tongue – yet her jaws closed on nothing as the drake wheeled away, the tip of his tail flicking up beneath her chin. Head snapping back, Calibrid growled, shaking off the tremor of pain, and gave chase to his fleeing hindquarters. A sideswipe was nothing to her. Anger roiled, clawing up into her lungs as fire built in her maw. He would not best her so easily! Or at all!

But the drake was far quicker and more nimble than she'd expected and shot out of reach as she breathed a jet of fire, not even touching his scales with a lick of flame. Calibrid grunted, soreness making her wing-beats slower than usual, and tried again, this time seeming to catch the very tip of his tail. Modrecai shuddered as if struck and her heart leapt in premature triumph.

He was hers! She snarled, forcing her body on, a helpful updraft giving her that little bit of extra height that she sorely needed. Her body ached to sink her teeth into that blasted dragon's neck and tear, life blood splattering to his beloved castle below. Calibrid dove for him, missing the drake by a fraction as he ducked away, tail whistling past her head. A mistake – one she would not make a second time. She just hadn't been quick enough, that had to be it. But, as she ramped up her attacks, giving him not a single moment of rest and respite, it was her attacks that continued to fail, leaving not one scratch on his scaled hide.

The sun dipped behind the clouds, casting a shadow over their battle, dragons nearly meeting and separating as the afternoon dragged on. Calibrid's scales remained untouched, bar the scrape down her side when she dipped too low to one of the walls, scratching herself up on the stone. Modrecai made few attacks, seemingly content to keep her at bay and wearing herself out now that she was airborne.

She snarled, intimidation rolling from her gaping maw. How was the dragon able to evade her at all? He should have already been broken and limp upon the castle walls, entrails scattered for the carrion birds! Calibrid snapped and lunged, only to fall short and staring stupidly at empty air once again. She was better than he! She had to be!

But, no matter, what moves the dragoness tried, pouring as much strength and yearning into her muscles as she possibly could, she could not touch the dragon. Calibrid's strength flagged, whipping about in midair and every nearly latching her teeth around the base of his neck. Yet again, just like all the other times she'd gone in for the kill, Modrecai twisted away at the last moment, rumbling and flicking his tail as if all he was doing was merely toying with her. Her eyes narrowed. It was all a game to the old drake.

How was he so nimble? Her body seared with heat – too hot for comfort, although it, blessedly, served to fuel the store of fire burning in her chest, just waiting to be unleashed. Calibrid panted, her massively sides filling with air only to expel it again in search for breath that would stop her chest from aching so much. Nothing she did seemed to ease the tension in her body and she threw herself after the older dragon with increasingly desperation, attacks wilder and, as a consequence, more easily avoided.

The dragoness sagged in midair, head and tail drooping. Was she outmatched? Would she have to turn tail? The little voice in the back of her mind snarled and stomped and told her that she could not possibly do that. She had to claim what she had gone there to claim. There was only one thing that was to be done and she would do it, even if it meant forfeiting her life in the name of all dragons – in the name of gold lust.

She lifted her head, spines rattling lightly down the back of her neck. Modrecai grinned, jaws parted in that draconian fashion as rancid breath rolled from his maw. She recoiled from the stench, looking at him closely for the first time since they had taken to the air.

Was it her imagination or were his dull, red scales becoming just a little bit brighter? She shook herself. Focus! She had to focus. A trick of the light, that's all it had to be. And who cared what colour his heaven damned scales were anyway?

Circling the central tower, they faced off, eyes locked on one another as they each tried to gain the advantage, unwilling to break off. Tiredness clawing at her eyes, Calibrid's eyelids dropped and she looked down, a sparkle catching her gaze a moment before her eyes closed altogether.

There! His gold! It gleamed in her eyes, reflected off the twin orbs as she circled the tower, barely concealed within. She couldn't believe she'd managed to miss it before! The dragoness split off from their circle, hissing wantonly as she crashed into the top of the tower. Stone crumbled beneath her feet and she clawed desperately at it, gold lust begging her mind to feel its glittering touch on her scales, coins sifting between her claws. She moaned deep in her throat as the old stones gave way, sending her crashing into a round room where there was nothing but a golden gleam.

Coins shifted beneath her and she splayed herself flat on the mound, rubies trickling away from her claws like water. Her maw gaped open and she crooned into the gold, squirming delightedly on her belly. He had had a hoard after all! She had started to doubt herself.

But there was something wrong. She pulled her head back, blinking rapidly as if dazed. Something was very wrong.

There wasn't anywhere near enough gold in the tower. Why, even what she'd found seemed to dwindle before her eyes, shrinking into a pitiful heap that she could hardly believe she had been rolling around on a moment ago. Where was the rest of it? She frowned, looking around as if expecting it to leap out at her. There had to be more. No one would have spoken of such a little hoard.

Oh, little dragoness... The touch of his mind crept in from outside the tower. You were too easy to fool, just like all the others who came before you. I had so hoped that you would be more of a challenge.

She shook her head, a sense of sluggishness trickling through her veins as she panted, head hanging low to the floor. She was a challenge... Calibrid growled and clawed at her head. Did he think she'd given up? No, the gold was just a taster for her – something to egg her on to end their battle all the sooner.

Yet she couldn't find the strength in her limbs to push herself from the tower again, legs trembling as they splayed and her tail arched up over her back. Eyes bulging from their sockets, she whined and pushed her snout through the gold, letting the few goblets, coins and jewels cover her muzzle only to be sent flying in all directions as she threw her head back once again.

Modrecai chuckled, thoughts curling into her mind as she hissed and strove to bat them away.

Even if you failed my expectations, you shall nevertheless be oh so sweet to take.

Her head snapped up.

I am not to be taken!

The snarl seemed so strong in her mind, yet it felt dead in her thoughts, as weak as a hatchling's protests in the nest. Staggering, she whimpered and rocked her hips back, shocked at her own actions as images of an imaginary partner flashed through her mind over and over. A dragon... She shuddered. No, the strongest, most powerful drake pushed up over her back in her mind's eye, ridged shaft questing entrance at her drooling mound.

No... No! Calibrid moaned and rolled her head from side to side, unable to pin her tail down again to cover her suddenly dripping vent. Tucked up close to the underside of her tail, it flexed, flushed with blood, and pushed out a dollop of her juices, hormones thickly flooding the air. What was happening to her?

She felt the drake's mirth swell through her mind.

There's something special about my hoard, little dragoness. Why don't you come back out here and join me? You shall soon be enlightened.

Grinding her teeth together, she clawed at the opening in the wall, a window that had long crumbled into a yawning gape, and thrust her head back into the bright sunlight. Blinking rapidly, she hissed, dragging her tail down with as much willpower as she could possibly muster. The drake, perched on the courtyard wall, smirked and tilted his head.

Are you facing some difficulty?

Calibrid snorted, fire shooting from her nostrils. Whatever was wrong with her body, it would not lead to him besting her – she would make sure of that! She flung out her wings and spiralled gracefully down to the courtyard, landing with a softer thump on the grass. Swinging her head back and forth, she swallowed, recoiling from a world that suddenly appeared a great deal more vibrant and stringent than it had only a few moments ago. Shaking her head, she hissed lowly, nosing at the grass.

What is happening to me?

The drake sprang from the wall like a wild cat and landed with sinuous grace before her, stalking forward with his head held arrogantly high. Modrecai's scales glittered like the gold she had so craved, yet every thought of his hoard had been chased from her mind at the very moment she'd realised that his stash was not all it had seemed to be. He flicked his tail cockily back and forth, eyeing her with one great amber orb that seemed to glimmer with amusement. Muscle rippled beneath his scales, bulging out around his haunches and legs as if he didn't even need to use his wings at all, but was instead capable of propelling himself to immense heights through the use of his earth-bound limbs alone.

Calibrid's jaw dropped. Where was the old drake she had been fighting around the towers and torn up gardens? This drake...well... Her stomach churned as if full of snakes and heat spread up her neck in dark, hot patches.

Swaggering, Modrecai sauntered up to her, a rumbling chuckle vibrating down his barrel. As he approached, her legs trembled, refusing to obey her direction. Forelegs half-buckling, she growled and struggled to force herself back up again, tail winding back and forth as she sought desperately to keep it from pushing up over her back once more. Fire burned in the back of her mouth, a sour taste that didn't belong there. She couldn't act like a wanton slut around Modrecai! She'd heard the stories about what happened to young dragons before they knew what mating truly was!

And Calibrid was yet to experience her first male. The dragoness covered a moan with a yawn as he circled her, appraising her from all angles as something bulged beneath his stomach, a slit opening up close to his hind legs. She shook her head. No! She had to fight it! Was it her first heat? She couldn't tell what was truly going on – had no experience with which she could explain what was happening to her. All she knew was that she had to keep her tail down and the male away from her.

Yet that was impossible with raw, unbridled lust rolling off him in forbidden waves. Calibrid whined, frozen in place as her eyes grew wild.

Relax, my dragoness... He crooned, nuzzling the base of her neck with surprising tenderness. This will all be worth it soon.

Would it? She wasn't so sure she was ready to believe him. She snarled and tried to whip her tail around his neck, but it refused to obey her direction, hanging limply over her back as she pushed her rump up. Thought after thought of him pushing lustfully into her raced through her mind, that deliciously fat cock-head spreading her open wider for the very first time.

You should have been more careful around your first heat, young one, his thoughts whispered sinuously to her, coiling beautifully around her mind. For now it is I who gains a prize today.

Calibrid groaned and pressed her cheek to the dirt, panting and rocking her hindquarters back. Why wouldn't he just fuck her already? What was wrong with him? He'd proven himself – he had her. He could have her any way he wanted.

Why... She forced the words out. Did you know I'd come into heat today?

He laughed and shook his head.

My hoard is not only in that tower, little one. It only shows you what you have truly been desiring all along.

He licked his lips, turning his flank to her to show off his dropped shaft, pushed out fully from the secretive slit on his belly. She sucked in a gasp, drinking in his length and girth with hungry eyes. Calibrid tipped forward, a low groan building in the back of her throat as her protests died along with her flame.

In this case, it is myself you have been craving, wanting, yearning after. I cannot claim to be surprised, though I do go to great efforts to conceal the true nature of my hoard. It may cause me to drive off more unwanted guests than I have time to put my talents to.

He eyed her curiously, a strange expression on his muzzle as his tail swung lightly.

Perhaps you, I shall keep around a while longer. If you wish to stay, my dear.

She hissed.

And what is that supposed to mean?

Groaning, she trembled and quaked, hating herself for wanting him so badly even as the drake nuzzled over her tail, easing closer and closer to her puffy folds. She growled and snapped, though remained in place, quivering as if she could make him move more quickly if only she froze. There was no point in whipping about the face him and demanding pleasure – that would put her

What had his gold done to her? Her head reeled. Had it really just drawn her mind from the lust of gold and turned it to its true desire – the lust of a dragon? Was it really that simple? It would have made sense as to why no other dragon But every dragoness wanted a drake – that much was known. She wanted a big, strong, powerful dragon to take her virgin cunt, put a clutch of eggs in her belly. The scent of her arousal swamped her mind and she rumbled as she arched back, determined to make herself look as enticing as possible for her would-be partner. Yet was it right? Grinding her teeth together, Calibrid huffed heavily. All she knew was that she craved him with every fibre of her being.

Modrecai purred softly, sides vibrating, as he nipped at her tail, breath teasing her folds with the lightest of touches. Her breath caught as she leaned back towards him, yet was not fortunate enough to feel the teasing swipe of his tongue.

What is that supposed to mean, you ask me? He repeated her prior question. I am not a drake to take a lady without knowing that she wants me too.

Is this not enough? She snapped back, the plaintive edge to her thoughts sending a shudder through her body as her vent drooled. Look at me! It's obvious! What more do you need from me, you bastard of a dragon?

Modrecai dropped his snout to her vent, snaking out his tongue to stroke wickedly over her softly scaled cunny lips. She hissed and ground her horns into the dirt, a sign of abject, willing submission in draconian culture. It was humiliating, smearing mud into her scales, but if it got him to mount her, what did she care about something as trivial as that?

I want to hear you say it.

Say what?

He nipped her rump, making her squeal.

I want to hear you say that you want me. Not simply rely on your body to tell the tale for you.

The dragoness rolled her eyes, whimpering as her vent twitched, passage pushing out her juices to further prepare her body for the breeding that was to come. Modrecai purred and languidly lapped up her arousal, slipping his long tongue into her pussy to better savour her taste.

Eyes rolling back into her head as her senses ran wild with sensation, there was no more Calibrid could do but throw him the words he needed to hear.

I want you! I want you to fuck me! Mate me! Breed me!

The words bit into his mind with a screech, Calibrid's chest heaving as if she'd flown a thousand miles. And that was all the drake had wanted to hear.

She would never have thought that the feeling of a male mounting her could be so sweet and yet it was, inexplicably so. With a rumbling growl that made her heart pound all the quicker, Modrecai wrapped his forelegs around her hips and pulled himself onto her, forcing her to bear the brunt of his weight. Although he was not much larger than the blue dragoness, the red dragon bore her forelegs down to the earth, pushing her front half into the crudely slanted shade beneath the courtyard wall.

An older dragoness would have told Calibrid of the crudity of dragon mating, yet the young female could not find the harshness in their coming together. Taking the base of her neck tenderly between his jaws, he bit down lightly as if to keep her in place, though Calibrid would not have found the willpower in her body to tear herself away from the dominating drake. His ridged shaft teased over her rump, inching closer to her vent as she groaned and ground back, back arched as her forelegs stretched out before her. Truth be told, there was little she could do besides demonstrate her submission to him, touching her horns to the dirt over and over again until she felt the deliciously tapered tip of his cock touch her heated folds.

The dragoness stiffened as the drake roared, body lurching forward under the power of his hindquarters. He drove his wings down into the ground as he thrust, driving into her virgin tunnel. Calibrid's body stretched to welcome him in and the dragoness raked her claws through the earth as she was filled so suddenly and brutally. Her arousal slickened her tunnel, easing his entry, and she growled into her paws, pressing her muzzle between them as she struggled to bear his massive size. Were other dragons bigger? Smaller? Either way, she may as well have been being split in two as each ridge popped into her, grinding over that sensitive nub tucked right at the bottom of her folds.

And it would have been a vicious interlude for the little dragoness if it hadn't felt oh so very good.

Hissing, the dragoness let her jaws hang open, tail slinking around Modrecai's shoulders to drape down his back – a safe endeavour as he had no dorsal spines to speak of, not like her.

Hers tickled his scaled stomach as he thrust, causing no damage bar a few scratches as he took her roughly. Gripping in front of her hind legs, the drake snarled and dragged her back onto his cock, grinding it as deep as he could possibly get his length, her vent swallowing him whole.

Take me!

Modrecai needed no encouragement from his conquest, hissing as he ploughed her needy vent, hindquarters working to cram every last inch into her that he could. A crow perched on the wall above cawed and tilted his head, watching the rough coupling with unusual interest for an avian. He must have been used to Modrecai and feeding off his scraps as their presence didn't bother him in the slightest. Keening shrilly, Calibrid trembled beneath her drake and trembled at the touch of his claws, pain lightly biting into her legs as he held her there, cock driving harder and faster with every passing second.

The dragoness groaned. If she had known before mating was so good, she would have done it when she had first passed into adulthood! Finding gold was a lark in comparison!

Yet, as the drake claimed her with every driving stroke, something about their surroundings changed, imperceptibly at first. She blinked, shaking her head, vision fading over with a shimmer of what she had so lusted after – originally, at least. Was she going to pass out with the drake mounting her? Calibrid tilted her head back and forth, trying to make sense of the splendour rising into existence as far as her eye could see.

His gold – his hoard. It was everywhere! The drake's cock claimed her for his own, a mere ornament to add to his collection as his gold swelled in great, heaving mounds around her, released as his pleasure swelled within her. She gaped and crooned at the rolling heaps of coins, precious, cut gemstones tinkling around her claws. Had he really been able to hide his hoard so openly? Yet left that one little scrap out so she could seek her true desires?

The dragoness panted heavily, torn between examining every scrap of shimmering gold he had to offer her and arching back into the long, powerful strokes of his cock. Draconian magic was powerful, yet she had not known just how much so. Who could have known that a drake in the hills could conceal such a massive hoard in plain sight? Calibrid panted and stared, eyes as wide as the stolen gold dinner plates splayed before her snout. No wonder she hadn't seen it if she had been so blinded by gold-lust.

Something tightened within the dragoness, a sinew drawing taut as she plucked it away from the bone of a kill. She twisted her head back and forth, mewling as she fought to contain the rising sensation, a high wind buffeting her wings. Calibrid snarled, riding out the storm, and bucked her hips back as it broke upon her. And she couldn't have anticipated a single drop of it.

Such pleasure! Her eyes rolled back into her skull as ecstasy crashed over her, tail whipping back and slamming into Modrecai's side. The drake grunted, cock suddenly moving with difficulty within her as she clamped down around him, pussy unwilling to let him pull away. Yet he had to finish too and dug the points of his teeth past her scales as he growled and drove his shaft into her with ever increasing urgency.

She felt the first throb of cum travel up his shaft, though there were no balls to pull in close to his body. Blood seeped between his teeth as he clamped down on her neck in a mating bite, roar muffled as he ensured she would not leave his castle without a clutch of eggs growing in her belly. The drake's roiling hiss sent chills through her body, hot splatters of cum coating her passage from the inside and oozing down his shaft as it was forced back out again. His continued thrusts slapped wetly into her as their combined sexual fluids dripped thickly down her legs to pool on the grass between them.

Calibrid shuddered as the drake finally stilled, ridges only digging lightly into her inner walls as his cock softened. The afternoon had worn on and the shadows slanting across the courtyard fell sharp and long, reminding her that there was still a sunset and a night of pleasure to come before slumber. She sniffed, nostrils flaring as she scented the air, the scent of late honeysuckle drifting to her on the breeze. She was unsure if there was a more ideal scent to capture how she felt about their heated liaison, hind legs still trembling from holding up Modrecai's weight.

She licked her lips, eyes desperately pleading where he could not see. If only the drake would have her. Would he have her? Every scale on his body made her tremble with need, having awakened a desire in her that she had not known existed. The dragoness whined quietly Now that she'd had it once, just the once, all she craved was rash ecstasy for the rest of her life in the yearning hold of a drake who deserved her.

Sighing softly, Modrecai slipped from her back, dragging his cock from her twitching vent. The dragoness whimpered, left empty and wanting for something she had not understood before. He stood back as she turned on her heel, tail lifted as if to keep her pussy available for him even if her back faced away. The drake smiled, eyes fiercely bright.

My gold was always here, Calibrid. You were only blinded by a deeper lust.

He shifted, eyes speculative as if he was taking a great leap into the unknown. She shivered, cum drooling viscously from her stretched pussy, as much as her vent tried to close up snugly again.

It is yours if you choose to stay, my lady.

Dipping his muzzle with undue respect, considering their rash liaison, Modrecai waited on her answer, the tip of his tail twitching back and forth like that of a domestic feline. Calibrid raised her head, gaze sweeping the vast expanse of gold – so many treasures that she thought she would have to send an entire lifetime truly appreciating its worth.

The dragoness churred and butted her head lightly into the drake's.

I think I should like to stay very much...my dragon lord.

She grinned, fire flickering at the back of her dark maw.

Perhaps, to seal the deal, I should have you mount me again? Simply to ensure there is a clutch in my belly and eggs in our future.

The only reply Modrecai had for his new lady of the castle was his body pinning hers to the mounds of gold, coins shifting musically beneath them as their roars echoed through the ruins.