

in his head that questioned why he was embarrassed. Why, he had only asked his friends to go ice skating!

Tom, a squirrel, raised his head, nose twitching feverently.

"I wouldn't mind," he said, smoothing the thicker fur down on the top of his head.

He met his eyes, nuzzle warmly with a smile.

"You would?"

"Yeah, why not? Spent too much time indoors anyway. Could even be fun."

Liam chirped and grinned widely.
Finally! It had taken long enough! One was better than none for sure.

"Brilliant, do you fancy doing Monday night? You'll need to rent skates but it's two quid, nothing big. Monday's real quiet too."

"Sounds good," Tom said,
tapping a finger against his jaw.
"Thick socks, right?"

"You won't need those," Neil snorted. "Why bother going into a cold room with shoes
that pinch your paws?"

"Well," Liam mused. "The skates can be a bit- crap to eat- but it shouldn't be a problem for an hour or so."

"You'll complain." The deer
huffed and rolled his eyes dramatically. "Why would you ever consider it? You'll get laughed off the ice and sent away."

Tom looked down at the cords
in his paw.

"Maybe you're right..."

"You'll never learn if you don't try." Lion argued. "Besides, it's only for fun."

"Oh, of course it is."

"Here, I'll come watch. Can't wait to get a picture of you on your case."

He took a shot of Tom's skirted face, the squirrel skibony rapidly after the order flash.

"All up on Twitter, my friend...
Nothing will go undocumented."

The squirrel swallowed and shook his head, sinking into himself as if to appear as small as possible. Plopping back on to the sofa, Neil fiddled with the camera, watching Tom out of the corner of his eye.

"You know..." Tom stared at the game board. "On second thought..."

Liam's heart sank and Neil put the camera aside, antennae tilted cockily.

"Wise choice, Tommy, very wise choice."

Liam said nothing, picked up

Rick growled, defeated by the throw.

Am. High score.
