

you wanted to watch..."

Liam perked up and ran to the little television set - a hand me down, of course. Switching it on, he reached for the remote only for the wolf to rest a paw on his forearm, gently staying his eagerness.

Liam tried not to think about how good that paw felt.

"What's up?"

"Game won't be on TV if it's NHL," Darren explained, with a quick glance around the room. "Do you have a laptop?"

Liam cringed.

"Will a computer do?"

Danner laughed in a flush of white canines that made Liam's heart flutter in his chest.

Stop that, he told himself. You're acting like a cub. So cut it the hell out. We are NOT going there.

"Of course a computer will be fine," the wolf chuckled. "Why on earth wouldn't it be?"

"Um, I don't know?" Liam fumbled for words. "Better screen?"

Glancing at the decrepit box of a PC gathering a fine layer of dust in the corner of the room, Darren half-shrugged.

"As long as it does its job, hey?"

Nodding, Liam brushed a paw surreptitiously over the desk square desk, checking for dust, and seated himself on the computer chair. It was in surprisingly good condition for his flat, an online auction purchase that he was particularly proud of snapping up. Wheeling it home down the high street, however, had been a different matter altogether.

As Liam set up the computer,

Darren moseyed into the kitchen, returning with a wooden chair in his paws. The wolf shonugged.

"Thought I spotted it in the kitchen. Will be easier to sit by the computer."

"You have a quick eye," Lion commented. "You didn't even go into the kitchen."

"~~Have to~~ Thanks. Have to have a quick eye for the little things."

"Mm," Lion murmured non-committally. "So... what site do I go to?"

"Finally loaded up?"

"Yeah, takes long enough though."

Wam had the good grace to chuckle but could not stop the hot flush of embarrassment from searing his skin.

Unknowning, Darren scooted the straight backed chair in close to Lion's, tail wriggling through the gap in the wooden slats. He leaned forward on the desk to take control of the mouse, lips just barely parted as he pulled up a buffering online stream of the game in question five minutes in. At least the internet was of a good speed.

The wolf's tail wagged, brushing against the otter's draped over the side of the swivel chair. Freezing, Liam pretended not to notice and focused on the players, putting together what knowledge he had gleaned from watching the amateur game. Popping the snap top back on his beer can, he poured it into the glass with the steadiest paws he could manage, cold sweat trickling beneath his fur.

The tail did not move as he took his first ghyg, then a long draught and then drained the glass. There was more in the back of the cupboard and Liam
