

A Wolfess and Her Stallion

The grey wolfess leaned her chair far back, balancing it on only two legs as she cast another impatient glance at the clock yet again. She ran her fingers through her thick, coal black head fur, further ruffling the already unruly mop of hair, and let her chair drop back on to all four legs with a loud clatter, turning the heads of many other furs seated in the milkshake parlour.

It was a favourite abode of hers, Joe's Milkshakes, and a place she frequented so much that she had become a familiar face to both the other regular customers and the staff, who were always sure to give her a friendly wave when she entered. She was well known there and she made it a habit to visit every few days, even if it was just to pick up an order to take away with her on her travels. She rarely stayed in one physical place for long, enjoying an active life spent mostly outdoors.

For a wolfess of fairly average appearance, Sam often felt that too many eyes rested upon her, roving across her fur with a mixture of curiosity, shock and, sometimes, raw lust. It was one of those moments. Snapping her head around, she scowled ferociously at the rather delicate looking, dappled grey equine that had been openly staring, mouth slightly agape, at the large, conspicuous bulge in her jeans, which she was making no such effort to conceal. He blushed deeply under his grey fur, dipping his muzzle down in embarrassment at being caught staring. The stallion left soon afterwards with Sam's predatory gaze boring into his back and left his half-drunk beverage on the table, as if he had forgotten it in his haste to leave.

Sam smirked, taking a sip from the tall glass in front of her, reflecting upon how easily her sex as a hermaphrodite could attract and repulse. It wasn't something that bothered her, at least outwardly. Inwardly, she wished she could find a nice mate, a nice male who wouldn't see her just in the interests of sex, but be someone she could have fun with out of the bedroom too. Not having many romantic notions, Sam didn't care for flowers or gifts of chocolates and the soft, loving scenarios that her girlfriends craved didn't appeal to her half as much, so she would never have expected that from a potential mate at least. But to find a guy who could be into the camping, horseback riding and most other outdoor activities...now that would be something special indeed.

"Are you waiting for someone?" A pleasant hiss sounded above her and Sam looked up curiously at an astonishingly tall, slender figure. The draconian femfur was tall for a femfur, reaching around six feet and three inches, Sam estimated from her lower position. But there was an electrified air about her that put Sam instantly on edge.

Without waiting for Sam to reply, the dragoness gracefully folded her slim frame onto the chair opposite, leaning back to survey the wolfess with a somewhat calculated gaze.

"I was to meet my date here, but it seems that he has been detained unexpectedly," she continued smoothly, stroking the table top with her short clawed fingers. "I don't suppose you would be so kind as to keep one company while she waits?"

Sam shrugged, unsure what she should really say to this strange new companion – instead she took the time to look over the dragoness, who was smiling toothily at her and not in an altogether unpleasant way. Aside from her height, she had a very narrow framed body with a long torso and legs that any model would have been proud of. It was difficult not to notice the relatively small amount of clothing that adorned her body, as she only wore a cut off, white tank top, which ended a scandalous few inches below her generous bust and a fashionable pair of white denim shorts.

The wolfess resisted the urge to snort as the owner of the parlour, the red fox from which the parlour took its name, trotted over eagerly, almost tripping over his own paws in his haste to serve the dragoness. Sam wasn't sure if it was the dragoness' attire or her colouring that had Joe so eager to take her order before anyone else, as her scales and markings were equally attention drawing. She was an exotic, deep orange colour with subtle red stripes running across her back and ending in narrow points on either side of her torso. On any other fur, the colours might have been garish, an eyesore and not attractive in the slightest, but for the mysterious dragoness, it was eccentrically alluring.

The dragoness flirted conversationally with Joe while she gave her order, the normally shy fox stammering and colouring up quickly under her practiced. The wolfess felt as if she was being studiously and rudely overlooked in the arrival of the attractive young fox – a stab of annoyance jabbed at her innards. Did the dragoness even remember that she was sitting there?

“I’m Tahira,” she accentuated, extending a paw over the table for Sam to shake and it was with a small but certain degree of wariness that Sam did reach across to take the cool scaled paw in her own.

No apology for ignoring me, nothing, she thought with disgust, casting the newly christened Tahira a scowl that made her flinch visibly.

“Sam,” she replied. The first word spoken to the dragoness was decidedly cool and offhand, gaining another clear wince from her.

“This is a nice place.” Tahira made an attempt at conversation, waving her paw vaguely around to indicate the half-full parlour. “My first time here.”

“Clearly,” Sam growled, scowling openly at the dragoness who looked rather taken aback at the evident dislike Sam was displaying, as if she was entirely unaware of what she had done to provoke such a reaction.

The atmosphere was suddenly very tense while neither knew what should be said next. The dragoness tapped a claw against the table, her eyes shifting from one customer to the next until Joe scurried back, a frothing milkshake glass clutched tightly in both paws. Depositing the glass in front of the dragoness, he backed away a step, half bowed and then caught himself before completing the respectful and utterly inappropriate motion. He mumbled something as he went to walk away and duly bumped into a neighbouring table before scrambling away, cheeks bright red with embarrassment.

The awkward silence continued, Tahira sipping at her drink and Sam frowning at her, the distance between them across the table suddenly appearing greater than a gaping canyon, so intense was the silence. But Sam didn’t have to wait long to find out what the dragoness was really there for, which wasn’t casual conversation, merely to pass time. Placing her glass on to the table with a deliberate motion, she clicked her claws together decidedly.

“Listen now,” she said clearly, leaning forward to rest her elbows on the table, acting as if she was suddenly in the middle of conducting some business. Sam was suddenly struck by the intensity of her sapphire blue gaze, so she didn’t immediately comprehend what was about to be proposed to her.

“Everyone here can see that you are, ah, different,” she said, putting a particularly emphasis upon the last word. Grunting her affirmation of that statement, Sam resisted the urge to look down at her very obvious difference resting in her lap. The dragoness continued, not noticing anything unusual in Sam’s demeanour.

“I’ll get straight to the point,” she smiled, a move that came across as very predator-like. “You’re a hermaphrodite. My mate wants some more adventurous activity in the bedroom. I figured a threesome with another would be perfect and here you are! It’s like it’s all meant to be, decided already.”

Sam couldn’t believe this was happening again. Another order – not even a request! – to bed a male! This had gone on for too long, she thought, struggling to not just leap up and wrap her paws around the throat of the dragoness who so dared to be so direct and had the sheer nerve to treat her like she was no better than a common whore. She bared her teeth and a low, barely perceptible growl ripped from her throat; the heads of several patrons sitting nearby turned curiously, wondering what was going down.

"I would pay you for your service, of course," she carried on, misinterpreting Sam's furious expression. "He's an equine," she added uncertainly, as if she half hoped that this fact would dissipate Sam's anger somewhat.

"Pay me? What for? So you can live out your dirty little fantasy?" She snarled, ears flat against her head. She curled her paws into fists upon the table and pushed her chair back with a loud screech against the linoleum.

"I am not a prostitute to be hired for sex!" Sam snarled, thumping her fist down and making the glasses shake. "Just because I am a herm does not mean you can walk up to me. When you find a herm advertised in one of those places where they are known to sell themselves, choose hir for your liaison, not somebody sitting in a public place, just trying to enjoy herself!"

"But I, I didn't mean," the dragoness stuttered, looking taken aback by Sam's words. "I just thought –"

"Yeah, well, you thought fucking wrong, didn't you, dearie?" The wolfess said, her anger only growing as the dragoness eyed her up and down as if she believed Sam was playing some kind of elaborate joke upon her. Sam was turning to leave when the dragoness' words stopped her dead in her tracks.

"So you won't even consider the offer?"

She turned back slowly, eyes blazing so fiercely that Tahira cowered slightly in her seat, unable to even make eye contact.

"Consider the offer," Sam repeated slowly. "Sounded more like just something you wanted me to do and you didn't care how rude you were, as long as you got it. People like you make me sick to my stomach. I am who I am and I'm not gonna bed any fur who comes round waving a wad of cash under my muzzle!"

Deciding that there was little chance of her friend showing up so that they could head off together, Sam drained the remainder of her milkshake in one gulp and wiped the back of her paw across her muzzle, giving Joe a goodbye nod before striding out the door. She staunchly ignored the slack-jawed gapes and stares of the remaining customers and the furious blushing of the dragon she left behind.

She knew where she was headed.

*

It was a relief to finally get to the stables, although she did wonder what had happened to delay her goat friend, who had promised to meet her there. At least he had the decency to send a text in which he apologised for not turning up and saying that he would explain later. Something must have come up for him – she knew he enjoyed their weekly visits to the out of town stable yard just as much as she did.

True the yard was small, with only a row of five stables, but its size meant that fewer people would be there to stare at her. It was also the place where she kept her own horse, a white based appaloosa mare, with a multitude of black spots covering her entire body, who reached about fifteen hands and two inches high at the point of her withers.

"Hey there, darling," Sam murmured, kissing Skylark's spotted muzzle lightly as the mare nickered a greeting, her pink nose questing against her owner's paw for treats. "Did you miss me?"

"We did," a teasing voice came from behind her.

The wolfess turned to see the owner of the stable, a curvy white dragoness with an impressive pair of leathery, bat-like wings sprouting from the centre of her back, between her shoulder blades. Wearing a pair of riding jodhpurs, modified riding boots for her claw tipped hind paws and a loose fitting polo shirt, with the buttons at the top undone, she constantly attracted the attention of the male customers who visited her yard for private riding lessons or to ask about keeping their horses there. She was slightly shorter than the wolfess at five feet three inches, but was significantly more feminine and striking in appearance – a difference that their friends would often tease them about, good naturedly, of course.

“Hi,” Sam barked happily, wagging her tail in welcome, feeling more content and self-assured than she had in a long time; she wasn’t normally one to show emotion so openly.

“Haven’t seen you down here for a while, honey,” Celine smiled warmly, flicking the tip of her white tail in the direction of Skylark’s stable. “Sweetheart here has missed you.”

“I know,” Sam murmured, nuzzling into Skylark’s neck as the mare lipped at her hair, attempting to groom her affectionately in response. “Exams kind of take over sometimes.”

“Sometimes,” Celine joked, picking up a pair of discarded lead ropes and head collars from the dusty ground. “But now you have the summer ahead of you again, isn’t that good? What plans do you have, hon?”

“Not much, was just planning to work on my riding, enter a few jumping competitions, maybe,” Sam thought carefully. “Got offered a job by Joe at the milkshake parlour, so I’ll be doing hours there, but it’s only part-time, so I’ll be able to come down here pretty much every day still.”

“Your local haunt,” the white dragoness nodded approvingly. “Planning to buy Sky a new set of tack? Some new rugs?” Sam nodded in reply, albeit more vigorously than Celine had.

“Yeah, I’ll be able to do a little more with that cash, rather than just ride Skylark. Guess I’m lucky that my parents decided to pay for her upkeep,” she added as an afterthought.

“How are they these days?” Celine asked sympathetically, her head tilting slightly to one side.

“Alright I guess,” she growled in a highly offhand manner, suddenly busying herself with searching for Skylark’s lead rope. “They pay my part in the bills for the shared house; they pay for Skylark’s stable here. They have no more interaction with me than that. You know they don’t want me around. Never did.”

An unusual, uneasy silence fell between them, something quite strange for the close pair. Celine knew all about Sam’s relationship with her parents, if it could even be called that. They had always been somewhat distant from her, because of her sex. They were both very conservative and never had much tolerance for any fur that differed from what they considered the norm, rather than what society considered the norm. The dragoness sighed quietly, knowing that Sam would never discuss it further with her, and tried to move the conversation on.

“Got a new boy down here just recently,” Celine said casually, almost as if she was letting the information slip by pure accident. It had its desired effect, however, as Sam’s ears perked up immediately in her interest at seeing a new horse on the yard.

“Oh? Did you put him out in the fields already?” Sam asked curiously, glad that the topic had moved on from her parents, but frowned when Celine snickered delightedly.

“Not a horse, silly, a customer! Does everything have to have a mane and tail for you to be interested?” Joking light-heartedly, she paused, rethinking her last question with a twinkle in her eyes. “Although I can’t say that this one doesn’t have a mane and tail... That’s for you to find out.”

The wolfess shook her head at her friend’s teasing, watching her walk back up the yard and throw a conspiring wink over her shoulder. She was impossible.

“Um...here?”

Did every voice have to come from behind her that day? Spinning on her heel to face the new fur, Sam's muzzle opened to greet him, as the voice clearly came from a male, but then her mouth dropped open in surprise.

"You!"

It was the dappled grey stallion from the milkshake parlour. He was rather slight in build for a stallion with a more effeminate look that most would deign to display and he had a pair of soft-grey feathered wings that she had not noticed before in her aggravation. Gulping noticeably, he shuffled his hooves and smoothed his paws over the front of his shirt – a nervous motion.

"Um, hey," he murmured, eyes downcast and the fur on his muzzle bristling gently under his furious blush.

"So, you're the new customer here," she said evenly, surveying him with a careful eye. The grey equine rubbed the back of his neck nervously, seeming unable to look at her directly, perhaps due to his earlier embarrassment. He did seem genuinely embarrassed and remorseful about his rude staring earlier, she thought to herself. But Sam was still unsure about his, despite how mortified he was to cross paths with her again.

"Well, welcome then," she growled, trying to keep her voice level, neither welcoming or disconcerting.

He took a step back, finally lifting his muzzle and meeting her eyes for the first time; Sam was startled to see that they were a vibrant, bright blue colour, both beautiful and naturally striking.

"I'm Daniel, or Dan, if you prefer," he said firmly, extending his paw towards Sam with a sudden display of will on his part. Hesitantly, Sam shook his paw briefly and then returned it to its previous position, dangling at her side, where it prickled uncomfortably from his touch.

What's wrong with me? She thought furiously, striving to keep a blush from her muzzle.

"Sam," she murmured in reply, her tone somewhat warmer than it had been before – something which Daniel was immediately aware of, as his ears pricked up eagerly and his muzzle took on a happier expression.

"Nice to meet you, Sam," he whinnied quietly, swishing his tail keenly. "I moved here a few months ago, but I've had some trouble finding somewhere to stable my horse."

"Oh yeah?" She probed, her natural curiosity rising within her. "What breed is he? And what do you call him?"

He smiled pleasantly at her questions, his eyes lighting up at the prospect of being able to talk freely about his pride and joy.

"Fen's a Warmblood gelding," Daniel stated proudly, seeming to grow larger in stature as he spoke. "Bright bay, about sixteen hands and one hell of a jumper. I've shown him on the local circuit back where I used to live, but not placed in anything down here just yet."

Sam nodded, smiling but trying not to look too impressed with his barely concealed prowess in the show ring.

"You must have met quite a few other furs when you've been out and about," she probed gently, seeing if she could get him to talk a little more. She couldn't help but notice that he seemed rather shy and blushed easily.

"Yes, I've met a lot and keep in touch with some who show regularly," he continued, clearly happy to be questioned on this subject matter. "By phone mostly and we trade pictures from shows sometimes, it's nice to see where the other has got to as long as it doesn't turn into a bragging contest on the part of one fur," he laughed suddenly, a warm, genuine expression of mirth. "I do it for fun, not the bragging rights. Some furs don't seem to get that."

"I guess you haven't seen any herms when showing though," Sam said absently, the words out of her mouth before she realised the implications of what was said.

The effect upon Daniel was instantaneous. He blushed deep crimson to the tips of his ears and rubbed the back of his paw over his grey-white muzzle. The stallion dropped his muzzle down and half turned away shyly, not finding the courage keep eye contact with her. Sam couldn't help but note, not without some amusement, that when he rubbed his paw over his muzzle, he left a smear of black.

Must have been cleaning tack, she thought, straightening up and locking her paws together behind her back, her muzzle as impassive as she could make it. A small, but decidedly wicked part of her wanted to let Daniel stew and cringe for a minute. However, as he shuffled and muttered incoherently, trying and failing to begin a sentence, Sam felt a low sting of guilt for approaching the matter so bluntly with him.

Well, it is better to have things in the open, rather than dodge around the topic, she concluded, sighing inwardly.

"Um...yeah..." Daniel started again, looking everywhere but directly at the wolfess. "I'm really sorry about that, it was rude for me to stare and there's not really any excuse for it... Just that I'm sorry."

Smiling again, Sam stepped around, back into Daniel's line of sight and gave his muzzle a friendly lick. It was a rather bold action for her, but the look on Daniel's muzzle when she did it was worth the moment of vulnerability; he twitched his ears in surprise and blushed even harder, nuzzling her cheek softly in reply. Struggling not to shiver at the unexpected touch, Sam shook her head and took a step back, waving her paw dismissively.

"Forgotten," she chuckled warmly. "At least you had the good grace to apologise," she frowned, remembering her encounter with the dragoness. "Unlike most. I didn't mean to actually say it, it happens so often I forget about these things pretty quickly."

"So..." He began awkwardly, suddenly extremely bashful once more after their brief touch. "I don't suppose you would like to come out on a ride with Fen and myself? We're new here... Damn, that's already been said, but you know, we don't know the area very well and would like to, you know, learn the tracks 'round here a bit."

Sam froze, her back stiffening as the hair between her shoulder blades stood on end in a similar fashion to the hackles on a feral wolf. Daniel quailed slightly, wondering what on earth he had said wrong.

"A ride," she said slowly, her tail curling up around. "With you."

He backtracked quickly, stumbling over his words in his effort to get them out rapidly enough for his intentions to be made clear to the now smirking wolfess.

"I didn't mean anything by it," he neighed frantically, swishing his tail in evident distress. "I'm so sorry, I didn't mean to... What? Why are you laughing?"

"Lighten up, Dan," Sam laughed heartily, jabbing him in the ribs playfully – he shied away a bit, ears twitching in confusion. "I just couldn't resist."

Damn, he's so easy to tease, she thought rather wickedly, thinking that he could be very entertaining to wind up perhaps more than occasionally. After a moment, a soft smile spread across his muzzle and he shook his head slowly as if in despair at the quirky wolfess' antics.

"So, would you show me some of the rides around here?" He asked again, brushing his forelock from his eyes.

"Sure, sounds fun," Sam replied with a pleased wag of her tail. "I'll just tack up Sky and we'll be off now then, right?"

"Yup," he nickered with a grin, tossing his mane off his neck.

“Oh and one thing,” Sam grinned as she turned to leave, tapping the upper side of her muzzle with her paw. “You’ve got something right there.”

*

The trail was a vibrant burst of life that afternoon – everything around the two furs and their mounts was in constant motion. Tall hedgerows lined the farmland they passed at a relaxed trot, the wind rustling the leaves constantly and whispering softly against their fur, making Sam shiver with the slight chill. The horses snorted and huffed at the clouds of dust that rose from their hooves as they walked and trotted along the dry track; there had not been a decent spell of rain in weeks and the ground was suffering for it, even if the tougher grass bore up well under the cool, late-spring temperatures.

It was such a relief to be outside, the simple thrill of escaping from the tedious steps of normality something truly wonderful for Sam to experience. Although, when all was said and done, it was a pleasure she seldom appreciated to such an extent with the company of another fur.

He’s so strange, Sam thought, clucking to her horse to encourage her to trot on, Dan following a pace behind.

“Jeez,” Sam muttered to no one in particular, believing that Dan was out of earshot. “Men should come with a warning label.”

He grinned behind her back, rubbing the towel across his exposed fur vigorously to dry it.

“And why is it that men should come with a warning label?” He teased, throwing the towel at her, where it landed over her head. Sam yelped in mock indignation, whipping it off and throwing it back

“You’ve sure warmed up to me since

“You better have a good explanation for this.”