

Taken by Six Raptors Submitting to the Beasts

Alis Mitsy

Groaning, Ruby ducked her head down between her arms as the raptor pushed over her, his cock pulling slickly from her pussy. Very little of his seed escaped her pussy as he withdrew, barking proudly in that sharp, raptor call and baring his teeth at his conquest. The young woman huffed and stayed perfectly still, sweat trickling down her back as she held on to the fence for dear life; it may as well have been the only thing keeping her semi-right as the raptors had their way with her.

The raptor with the green stripes was quickly replaced with another, allowing her no respite from the rampage of cocks, all intent on one thing and one thing alone. The third – wait, how many had taken her so far? Ruby's eyes rolled back into her skull, numbers and partners whisked from her mind as if by an invisible artist's brush, depicting the scene with as much erotic skill as they could muster while the scene played out. Hunching down and rounded his back so that he dropped to her level, the new raptor grunted, sides vibrating as he jabbed senselessly, cock sliding over her backside, which was already soaked in missed sprays of raptor semen.

She would have thought that dinosaurs, even though resurrected with the bias of genetic manipulation, would have been more discreet in their lovemaking, more refined. However, their mating was every bit as carnal as that of creatures happily roaming the earth and potentially even more so brutal in its harsh impatience.

Perhaps a little bit of their mating patterns had been implanted in their behaviours for show. His cock struck deep, driving home into her wet and welcoming cunt. Ruby gasped, saliva drooling from the corners of her lips, the grain of the wooden fence – nothing more than a prop for show in the enclosure – biting into the palms of his hands.

Okay, maybe they had redesigned the velociraptor's mating patterns a little too well.

But she had no say in what the dinosaur park raptors did to her, stripping her of what little innocence she had left. Although she was not a virgin, her previous partners had been sweet and kind, adoring her body with the lightest of touches that had her squirming and writhing for more that never came, need rolling through her body into the dead of the night even after orgasm. She had wanted more that they simply didn't have the capability to give her. But the raptors did and she felt it in every vicious slam, their claws scraping down her sides as they fought for leverage her slighter, more delicate body could not provide. Yet that would not dissuade them.

Her breath caught, eyes wide and bulging as the tip of the raptor's cock ground up against her inner barrier, allowing him no deeper even though a good few inches of his length hung outside her stretched pussy. The only lubrication provided were the streaks of cum left behind by the previous beasts and her own arousal, which was plentiful even as her cheeks burned, a hot flush creeping down her neck. As the raptor leaned over her, claws catching in her half-shredded jacket, she didn't move to shift him, instead rocking back into every thrust and begging him to cum with the rock and sway of her body.

He was raw power. He didn't care for her pleasure. All he wanted to do was what implanted instinct told him to do. And he, for sure, was a crowd pleaser. He wouldn't stop until he was good and done with her, a well seeded and well bred female. There would be the other raptors to please then, over and over until every single one had had his fill of her and more.

And she loved every single crass second of it.

Ruby hissed through her teeth as the raptor suddenly sped up, his mating coarse and sharp as he took her. She supposed that, back in the days when his natural kind roamed the planet, every second spent mating would have been a time during which he was vulnerable to attack. And that was why he had to take her quickly, roughly and entirely without any consideration for the female beneath him, forced to bear his rampant thrusts, claws slicing into her shoulders as he threw them about. Although she shuddered, Ruby made no complaint. A little pain was worth it to steal pleasure from such a beast.

Instead, she set her shoulder blades back, moaned and hoped no one would find her being gangbanged by the park's star attractions.

*

Ruby sighed, wiping her hand across her brow. Her palm left a dirty smear in its wake and she grimaced, scowling at her own reflection in the distorted water trough. The trough stretched out nearly as wide as it was long and large enough for several people at once to sit in without touching. She chuckled at her reflection without humour, pursing her lips to make a face as her brown hair hung scraggly about her face. What would her mother think of her if she could see her now, scooping shit in a dinosaur park?

Straightening, she stretched out her back, one hand still on the handle of her pitchfork, the prongs dug into the soft soil. Although she'd had the best grades in school, her mother had always wanted her to use her looks to make her career. Typically, the woman lived vicariously through her daughter and, more thankfully, it had been blatantly obvious for all to see. While her mother dragged her from photo shoot to modelling run, her relatives had secretly fed her lust for learning, helping her achieve the grades she wanted to keep her future on the right track and not one that would forever be dictated by her appearance.

She frowned, a murmur of dissent turning her lips down. Her relatives had always been good to her. She should give Uncle Tim a call sometimes; she hadn't seen him in months, not since she'd moved six hours away to take the job. There were so many members of her family that she didn't see anymore, all of whom she owed her career and her sanity to. Her mother, of course, rarely spoke to her anymore. Her father... She pushed him from her mind. Well, he wasn't in the picture anymore and that was all there was to it. She didn't have to worry about him.

Pushing her hair back from her face, she smiled at the herd of Triceratops cropping at the shrubs with their hard, beak-like mouths, barely aware of her presence. To them, she was far too small to be a threat and they had been conditioned right from the start to not see their human keepers as beings that would steal their eggs – one nice feature of the programming they had undergone at a genetic level. It would have meant otherwise that simply being in their vicinity would have been dangerous, the creatures unpredictable and prey to instinct at every turn.

Smiling, Ruby leaned on the pitchfork, resting her chin on top of her hands, and observed them some more, enjoying a rare moment of peace in an otherwise hectic day of keeper chores. The steaming pile of shit in her wheelbarrow didn't add much ambiance to the situation, but she had learned to ignore the stench. The dinosaurs themselves were what made the whole stinky, disgusting job worth it – what shut up anyone who said that she was wasting her education and, more importantly for some, her looks on shovelling dinosaur shit day in and day out. But everyone knew how the world worked and there was big money and learning to be made in the study of dinosaurs, the living fossils that had been resurrected through the wonders of modern science. Of course, the dinosaurs were not quite like their ancestors. To draw a crowd, modifications had had to be made.

Shaking her head, Ruby chucked the fork in the barrow and burst into action, trotting out of the enclosure with her tools safe and sound. The electric fence, really there in case of an emergency, allowed her through the security gate upon typing the code in on the panel and beeped madly, spraying a mist of dinosaur repellent in her wake. It was supposed to keep the beasts away from the exits and entrances of the massive enclosures – most needed a vehicle to get around – but most of the creatures had gotten used to the spray after a time. It was a little system that needed revamping.

No, she thought to herself as she stripped off in the staff changing rooms, ready for a shower after a long, hard day of grimy work. The dinosaurs were not exactly as they had used to be in too many years gone by, but clones of what they once were. The alterations, at first, had been minimal. Colours that had shown up as muted when they were reborn were made brighter, more vibrant, so as to draw the eye of an audience, all of whom paid to enter the park and gawk at the living attractions. Innocent enough. It had only snowballed from there, however, to the very behaviours of the animals being altered, sometimes for the better and sometimes for the worse, depending on which side of the fence one was standing.

Ruby wasn't sure which side she stood on as yet, but she was all for study, research and, above all, science. Taking a deep breath, she let the hot water of the shower wash over her, soothing the edges of her frazzles her mind and wiggling her fingers under the hot steam. She had something to contribute to the world of extinction made alive once more, only she didn't quite know what that contribution was as yet.

Ah well. Home waited at the end of her shift and she itched for a nice, clean bed made up with freshly laundered sheets and her favourite cheesy sit com. Simple delights were sometimes the best ones for a busy mind. And everyone was allowed their guilty pleasures, after all.

She exited the staff quarters, equipped to the nines with every substance known for removing dinosaur dung from skin, nails, hair and more, and made her way through the park at a lazy walk, her stride long and relaxed. The wind picked up her hair from her neck as she smiled at the last visitors of the day leaving the park, the sun just dipping below the distant mountains to cast the centre into a sleepy twilight. She cooed and waved to the lone Tyrannosaurs Rex pacing his enclosure, barely visible behind the vicious electric fence that would render him unconscious within a certain range. With that one, the park was no chances, despite manipulating his instinctual behaviour so that, theoretically, he would not harm even a bunny if it was not presented him on the feeding platform with the usual scents and sounds that meant that, yes, he could feed. Ruby blew him a kiss, but the giant lizard swung his massive head away from her without truly paying mind to her passing. He would still be her favourite for as long as she worked at the park, she was sure.

But he was not the star attraction – not by a long shot. The beasts that took that title were the Velociraptors, in all their toothy glory. Genetically designed to be the best crowd pleasers in their slick, narrow bodies, defined to the last ounce of muscle, they roamed their paddock with a long, loping stride. Their massive, blocky heads bobbed with every step, tails swinging from side to side as much for balance as they were part of a demonstration of dominance. For it was not the bulkiest or the largest raptor that controlled the pack, but the most intelligent that commanded true respect.

At least that was what the guide book said. Ruby sighed, eyeing up their enclosure, electric fence crackling behind a protective barrier designed to keep the public away from a man-made danger. One could never be certain how much of the raptors was natural and how much was concocted in a laboratory. She could only hope that her later research would discern just a little more of their behaviour and what lay beneath the skin of mankind.

She paused outside the raptor enclosure and stepped up to the ground-level viewing area, just for a quick look to see if they were still about. They were able to freely roam their large pen, so sometimes it was trickier to spot them from the ground – that was why the park offered tours and raised viewing platforms simply for guests to get a better look and, understandably, their money's worth out of their admission ticket.

She was in luck, heart leaping into her throat as the lead female – they had not defined a certain pecking order in this particular 'pack' – stalked into view, her head held high and tail poised to her rear. She chuffed and nudged at something on the ground, tail lashing back and forth. The whippy tip caught one of her pack mates and the dark brown raptor with tan stripes snarled at her, a roiling hiss escaping its muzzle.

Ruby swallowed. Tensions were not always so high in the pack. In fact, she had never seen the pack of eight so wound up, teeth showing as the pink of their maws flashed. Jaws powerful enough to grind through bones much larger than hers snapped closed on empty air with a shocking clack and she shivered back from them, wrapping her arms around her torso, although she was far from cold. They would always set her ever so slightly on edge.

Well, perhaps a little more than just slightly.

Just what had gotten into them? She furrowed her brow, wiping the mist of her breath from the glass as she shimmied up closer to the window, wrinkling her nose at the mess of fingerprints and snotty noses left behind from overly eager children. At least she didn't have to clean that off. But the raptors were far from settled, darting back and forth in front of the viewing area with their tails stiff and eyes unyielding in their sharp intensity. It wasn't quite a hunt, yet close enough to get the hairs on the back of her neck up.

Was that something on the ground, half hidden by the long grass?

Frowning, Ruby leaned in close to the glass, squinting as she peered into the enclosure. What on earth had been left in there? The raptors squawked and snarled, eyeing one another up with rolls of their animalistic eyes as they wove back and forth, circling the object with wariness in every step. To them, something strange represented danger, and their figurative hackles were up in a fight or flight reflex drilled into smaller predators. If caught alone, a raptor was a goner against anything larger. And there were plenty of larger dinosaurs about, including the herbivorous kind.

She couldn't see much, just what looked like a corner of red plastic poking through the grass, but it was clearly enough to send the raptors into a mild panic, aggression claiming the small pack like a virus. If they were left alone, there was no telling what they'd do to their enclosure or each other overnight with only the night wardens to supervise – and, truth be told, they were pretty useless when it came to monitoring the beasts themselves. Ruby groaned and rubbed her temples in what should have been soothing circles, but only compounded her throbbing headache. The raptors snarled and snapped, tensions rising as teeth flashed and eyes bulged.

There was only one thing she could do.

Clenching her pass in one hand, she entered the staff only section of the enclosure – blessedly separated from the raptors for the time being – with trembling hands. She would be quick, she assured herself, trying not to think of the sharp claws and teeth that awaited her on the other side. And it would be perfectly safe. They wouldn't have the beasts if there was even the slightest hint that they would ever be unsafe. She chuckled to herself, although there was no humour in her fear. Everyone had seen those old dinosaur park movies and no one wanted a repeat incident, no siree!

That didn't stop her from squeaking as she punched in the code to allow her access to the enclosure itself, every raptor head whipping about to face her. The lead female chuffed lightly, tail swaying.

“Easy now,” she murmured as she entered the enclosure, closing the gate securely at her heels. “Let's get you guys settled down again now, huh? Don't want to be wound up all night. The scary thing will be gone soon, I promise.”

Her voice had little effect on the creatures and the lead female tilted her head as if considering Ruby's words. Once again, she was shocked by the vibrant intelligence in those eyes and wondered just what the raptors may have been capable of if not so tempered by mankind's interfering hand. She shook herself, murmuring softly to them as she moved between beasts, breath steadying with every step. It would be okay. She knew that they would never attack a human being. It was all part of their programming.

And she had to trust that.

“Now, what's got you guys hyped?” She said, keeping the low, soothing tone for the sake of feeling like she was calming them down at least a little bit. “It can't be anything that terrifying, but I know you lot don't like any changes. Come on now, let me through and I'll see what I can do to settle you down, leave this place just as you like it, hey?”

The lead female shook her head, dark, leathery skin shifting over muscle, as if she didn't quite believe Ruby was capable of looking after her pack as she was.

Ruby approached the item cautiously, treating it almost with more respect than she did the raptors, although she would never have dared to touch one of them. A hard corner of dirty red plastic jutted up from the grass and the nearest raptor – one of the males – hissed and stepped back as she approached, craning her neck for a better look at just what had caused such a stir. It had to be something important for the raptors to be, well, not quite up in arms over it, but certainly wound up.

Peering, she rubbed her eyes, blinking several times as if to clear her sight.

A box?

Squatting, she frowned and tilted her head, curiosity getting the better of her as she examined it more closely. It had to be something more than that, surely? In trying to get a better view, she disturbed a moth from the grass and it fluttered into her face, making her screw up her nose and swallow the urge to flinch. That was one thing she didn't want to do around the beasts, even if they were supposed to be safe. But, try as she might, she couldn't get to the strange box without further intervention as the long grass concealed the majority of it from sight.

Sighing, she picked it up by her fingertips, surprised by how light it was between her hands. A strong aroma seemed to cling to it – something dinosaur-like? – although the scent was not entirely unpleasant and a trickle of dark fluid oozed down the side from the open cap at the top. On one side, someone had written on it in thick, black pen.

“Raptor formula one-zero-six-nine-nine-nine,” she read aloud from the side of the container, turning it over in her hands. “Experiment batch ten. Raptor breeding programme.”

Her face paled and she shot upright, heart hammering as she clutched the container to her chest like a lifeline – not that it would do her any good. The raptors were already closing in with deadly intent. Dimly, in the back of her mind, she recalled hearing some of the scientists – she'd had no idea what project they'd been working on at the time – speaking of how badly the breeding programme was going and that they were being forced to resort to chemical measures. Chemical measures that would trigger a raptor's desire to mate in particular.

Although she'd filed that information away for later perusal, Ruby had never thought it would come into play in the middle of the raptor enclosure where some foolhardy technician had left a tub of whatever they were trying on the beasts at that time. And the raptors weren't liking it one little bit.

The lead female bobbed her head and snarled, teeth glinting in the last dying embers of the sunset. Ruby whimpered, mind fogging over. What could she do? Frozen in place, her eyes bulged and breath only came with great difficulty as if the creature's jaws were already closing around her throat.

No! They were safe! Her mind reeled as she took a step back, but there was already a raptor there, bobbing its head with a seething hiss that sent tremors through her body. Hands shaking too badly to hold the box, she dropped it on her foot and flicked her eyes from beast to beast.

She had to make a run for it – it was her only hope. Her mouth was dry and, as she tried to swallow, she found no saliva to soothe her tight throat. Sure, the raptors were much faster than she was, but maybe, just maybe, they would be more curious about the box and undoubtedly the hormones it had contained to trigger the chase instinct.

Blood roared in her ears, adrenaline tingling down to her fingertips. It was now or never.

She spun and threw herself forward with a wild shriek, hoping against hope that someone would be left in the park to hear and rescue her. It was a small hope, but there were still night guards and she kept that flame of hope alight in her heart as her feet pounded the grass, the enclosure whipping past her. Through the cluster of raptors and a narrow space between two of the largest and most brightly coloured males she fled, too desperate to escape to breathe, the gate looming before her.

The raptors chattered, snapping and grunting at her back, and she hurled her weight into her run, legs flying as she fixed on the gate, the little light on the number pad blinking welcomingly. Her heart leapt. Nearly there! She could still do it! She could still get out!

And then something hard and too heavy slammed into the small of her back. She shrieked as she toppled to the grass, hitting hard and rolling, a sharp claw digging into her hip. It bit, piercing skin, and Ruby howled, clinging hopelessly to her side to stem the tiny prick of blood as she tried to gather her breath. But it would not come and she writhed uselessly as the lead female peered down at her with as cool and calculating a gaze as she'd seen on any predator.

The raptor seemed to smile.

Gotcha.

Her heart sank. That hadn't been an accidental space between the two raptors. Her skin cooled, blood retreating to warm her organs as shock clawed at the edges of her mind. They'd left that spot deliberately, funnelling her through like a fox down a hole.

Clawing at the ground, she dragged herself forward on her elbows and knees, dirt streaking a smear down her face. Breath finally raked through her lungs with searing pain and she cried out softly, not wanting to waste energy on a scream that may have only driven the raptors into a frenzy. But a solid foot and claw pressing down on her shoulder blades held her back, a clear warning.

Ruby froze, closing her eyes against the harsh glare of reality. What could she honestly do? Any movement would send that claw driving into her back and that would be that. It was all done for anyway. Holding her breath, she sent up a silent prayer for the end to come swiftly as the raptors stalked around her, rustling through the grass with a growl and a chirp of quiet, self-satisfied communication. It was surely not often that they were fed with live prey.

Yet the end that she'd expected never came. Neither the torture and maiming that she'd also expected as the beasts ripped her limb from limb. One of the raptors pushed his snout into her leg and huffed hotly, though she didn't dare move to look behind. It tugged at her trousers as she pressed herself into the grass, teeth catching. That seemed to be what he was looking for as he snapped up a bigger mouthful of the fabric and wrenched his head, yanking her back and ripping through her clothes.

This is it, she thought, holding her arms over her head as if that would give her any protection at all. This is where it all ends. I wish I'd thanked everyone more for helping me get this far... But it's too late now. It was too late the moment I stepped foot in his cursed enclosure.

Claws raked lines of blood down her thighs and Ruby gasped, tucking her head down against the ground as the raptor tore through her clothes, digging down to sweet, warm flesh beneath. The scent of fresh grass, soil and dinosaur dung clouded her nostrils and she sucked it in greedily, a little anchor in a sea of turmoil. The pain did not go deep – no more than scratches that a cat may have given a human – and she wondered faintly if adrenaline was clouding her pain receptors. It was an oddly sane thing to think in the moment before her sure death and Ruby almost laughed at herself.

The pain, however, did not grow and a second raptor joined in, grabbing her jacket between his teeth and tearing it loose from her back. Cool air licked her bare skin as it was exposed between tattered shreds of clothing and Ruby hid her face from the world, expecting worse at every moment. Regardless of her warranted fears, the worst that came was a slice of pain across her hip as the raptor's claw caught in her underwear and tore those loose from her body too. She breathed shallowly. Were they just undressing her for feeding? Had they gotten hold of an unlucky keeper at some point and discovered just how disgusting clothes tasted? Were they learning?

What she didn't expect was for the raptor to worm his nose between her mostly bare legs and steal a swipe of his tongue across her pussy lips. Ruby juddered reflexively as his tongue pressed briefly into her lips, teasing loose the natural moisture. Adrenaline had always had a funny effect on her body and her cheeks unduly coloured as she realised just how wet she was.

The raptor tilted his head from side to side as she finally dared to look back, tongue sticking out from his maw as he seemed to be trying to make sense of her taste and scent. But something was slipping from the very base of his stomach that sent renewed waves of panic rippling through her mind. Something that she should never have seen from a dinosaur outside their breeding programmes.

Oh no...

Ruby screamed and, against her own better judgement, dug her palms into the soft ground, half pushing herself up to her feet. The raptor snarled and, in but a moment, she was back on her knees as the beast shoved his muzzle back between her thighs, tongue lashing out across what he'd undoubtedly found to be a very sweet treat indeed. Her eyes widened and her breath only came shallowly as she didn't dare move, eyes fixed on the males before her as their slimy cocks protruded from the hidden slits right at the base of their stomachs, closer to their tails.

Dragging her torso up from the ground again, she shouted at the beast, but her words fell weakly in the air between them, carrying no real weight or strength. And then his claws dug into her hips as he pulled her more towards the height that a female raptor would be, shockingly gentle in his administrations. Sucking in breath after breath that didn't seem to soothe her racing heartbeat, Ruby wondered if they were more careful with females as they knew they were the ones to carry their eggs and, therefore, continue their bloodline? Instinct could linger on even through chemical intervention, or so it, at least, seemed.

He hunched into her, grunting softly as he ground his cock over her back and adjusting his position when he found his aim to be too high. The pack circled, cocks hanging and a different kind of hunger lingering in their eyes. There was no doubt as to what the six males would do to her – that was if the first sexually hungry raptor didn't ravish her to death first. All the while, the lead female eyed her evilly, tail flicking from side to side as she took care of the needs of her pack.

Taking a deep breath, Ruby knew what she had to do. If she wanted to survive, she was going to have to please the pack and hope they didn't maim her anyway afterwards. It would be a possibility, but the sense of the beasts had roused something deeper in her too. The wetness between her thighs, drawing his tongue in to her pussy lips in the first place, had not been purely from adrenaline. She closed her eyes, steeling every last nerve she possessed. She would need every last one of them.

The male's cock slid over her rump, fleshier than she could have imagined and surprisingly vulnerable without the protection of his leathery hide. Ruby growled and clenched her jaw, forgetting her own safety as she fought to drag herself away, yet it was no use. The male's soft tip teased at her opening as he hunched his back end down, contorting massively to breed such a strange female.

And then he pushed in, tail drumming down into the ground as he slammed deep. Ruby would have shrieked if any breath left in her lungs. He drove in brutally, ignoring any semblance of her pleasure and his thick cock stretched her wider than any man could have hoped to, her own lubrication easing its path only slightly. She panted, looking back between her legs as he hitched her up higher, feet scrabbling, to see just how much he stretched her out. Her head spun dizzyingly as he jerked inside her, a thick drool of clear fluid dripping from her strained pussy as he clearly prepared himself.

The raptor clung to her with a short, sharp chuff and tucked his back end down as he thrust. She wasn't the right size for him, but that didn't seem to put the raptor off as he gave her his best shaky, erratic thrusts, keeping his cock as deep as possible. Every thrust shot off another spurt of that clear fluid, which was not quite like any pre-cum or semen she'd ever seen, and it was forced out along his length as he thrust. The other raptors paced back and forth, dark cocks dangling, waiting their turn in the pecking order of the pack.

Ruby braced her trainer-clad feet and arched back, hair falling away from her face as she held down a moan. What the hell was going on? Her eyes rolled back into her skull as the raptor gave a particularly deep thrust, not even all of his cock in her. Getting fucked by a mindless beast wasn't supposed to feel good at all!

It was rude. It was crass. It was everything she'd never known she needed.

But every second spent mating was a second that a raptor was left vulnerable. Claws digging into her hips, the male snarled and grunted as he hammered her already sore pussy, claiming every inch of her cunt as he screeched out his climax. She didn't feel him filling her, but she felt every bit of hot dinosaur cum as it drooled from her abused passage, the dinosaur humping and grinding madly into her for every last drop of pleasure that instinct told him he was entitled to take.

His climax was short and he barely even dipped his muzzle to acknowledge the panting, horny female. Ruby groaned and rocked back into him, her body wanting more even if she wasn't letting her mind catch up with the reality of the situation. Dismissing her with a flick of his tail, he pulled his cock from her even as it retreated into his belly-slit, a decidedly self-satisfied tilt to his blocky head. Yet there wasn't any time in which to regain herself and take stock of just what had happened as another raptor took his place.

Instead of hauling herself away, Ruby moaned openly and stood, turning to face the beast as she crooned to him. The words didn't matter as she bravely stroked his muzzle, dipping her hand between her thighs to feed him a taste of her own juices. He lapped them up as eagerly as a pet and rumbled a groan, flanks vibrating. The keepers had a square pen in the enclosure for gathering and training the beasts and Ruby called the pack after her as she shakily jogged her way over to it, the shreds of her trousers tangling about her ankles. Once there, she rested her arms on the top wooden slat and leaned over, pushing her arse out for the next male in as open an invitation as any.

Jumping on top of her, the raptor screeched as he claimed her and drove home in a single, vicious thrust. She hung onto the fence for some sense of stability as the dinosaur snarled and thrust, taking his breeding pleasure from her the only way instinct told him how. Whether he was driven on by her body or the hormones flooding his system, Ruby simply didn't care. His cock didn't do anything for the swollen nub of her clit, but each juddering thrust squeezed over that sensitive patch of nerves inside her cunt, her g-spot giving her all the attention she needed.

Ruby rolled her head from shoulder to shoulder, pushing up onto her toes as the raptor hunched down, hot breath rolling over her shoulders. Every sensation built to a crescendo of grunts and barks and she howled like a beast herself as a sharp, unrelenting orgasm raced through her, sending her into twitches of pleasure. Her legs half-buckled and she braced them, leaning back into the dinosaur for balance as her head reeled and reeled and reeled with more pleasure than she ever could have imagined. Ecstasy shot through parts of her body that she had never before considered pleasurable and her howl devolved into needy grunts and moans as she begged for more, everything they had to give her. The raptor behind her didn't seem to care that she was acting and moving a little strangely, only hammering her increasingly sore, but far wetter, cunt until he too spent himself in climax and, like the first, dismissed her with barely a second glance.

Shakily clinging to the fence, she gasped and shuddered as the next raptor took his place, a seemingly never ending stream of males happy to give her pleasure after pleasure as long as their needs were also fulfilled. The lead female and her seeming second in command watched proceedings and Ruby could only hang onto the fence for a certain period of time before she collapsed in exhaustion, letting the raptors pick her hips up to a better level for them as they bred her over and over again. Full of raptor cum and thrust into multiple orgasms, Ruby moaned her encouragement to them and let them have everything they desired.

Only when she had serviced every raptor in the pack – more than once for some, she was sure – did they leave her in a mess of semen and sweat in the grass, her clothes wrecked beyond any hope of repair. But there was a fresh fire in Ruby's eyes and, as she summoned strength to tired limbs and brushed off her legs, her lips quirked up on one side in a lustful smirk.

Maybe she would be visiting the park raptors again after hours soon.