

Used by the Stallion

A stable lad gets up close and personal with their prize equine Stretching his arms above his head, Kian welcomed the crisp winter morning with a grin. Weak sunlight filtered through the trees beside the barn, casting a frosty chill over the sand arena and the hitching posts where the equines on the stud farm could be brought out for grooming, showing to an interested breeder or anything else really. It was not an uncommon sight to find four, five or even six horses tied to the wooden rail during the course of the day, as if he ever needed reminding that the barn was all about the equine inclination. It could hardly be forgotten with the sheer amount of shit he had to shovel each and every day. The muscles in his arms and back thanked him for it, however, shifting beneath his shirt as he closed the door to his beaten up car and hitched a backpack over his shoulder.

The stable yard lulled in sleepy barn warmth and he dropped his bag by the frozen hosepipe – that would be one of his first jobs of the day – as he made his way into the barn. He ruffled up his blonde hair with a gloved hand and blew breath into his cupped gloves, rubbing them together for warmth that did not come so easily. He jumped up and down, rubbing his arms, but warmth was not to be and he instead poked his head over the half door of the first stable in the row, blinking as his eyes adjusted to the gloom.

An equine shape came into focus, head lowered to feed from the hay bar in the back corner of the stall. The stallion's coat gleamed a bright brown with a black mane neatly trimmed to lie evenly down the full length of his neck. His forelock, however, had been left long to help protect his eyes from the nuisance of flies, although they became less of a problem as summer drifted further and further away.

Kian hefted his arms over the door and whistled as the horse's tail flicked.

"Hey there, stud," he murmured, a brighter spark returning to his eyes. "How are you doing this morning then, hey?"

The bay stallion flicked one ear back towards him, but otherwise continued chewing his hay, mouthful by sweet mouthful.

Kian chuckled and shook his head, flipping his hand dismissively as if the equine would be able to understand the gesture. He couldn't expect them to pay him any mind when it was so early: he hadn't even dragged the feed buckets out yet! He laughed to himself, ducking into the feed room at the end of the row of stables, a pile of freshly plumped hay nets just inside the door. The prospect of a full belly would surely send the barn into a morning chorus of neighs!

He lost himself in the morning routine, humming a tune as he dropped roughly scrubbed and filled feed buckets over each stall door in turn. The equines within snorted and neighed their appreciation, if they did not immediately thrust their noses into the bucket and snaffle up their feed so greedily that one could have imagined that they had not been fed for a week or more! Kian shook his head, lips pursed in a whistle, as the sun rolled higher in the sky and he moved on to his next chore, one job slipping seamlessly into the next, although he grimaced, wrinkling his nose. Mucking out was nobody's favourite task, yet it was important.

He shrugged, pulling up his collar around his neck for a scrap of extra warmth in the, thankfully, wind free barn.

“Hey now, honey,” he murmured, stepping up to the stable closest to the feed room.

The inhabitant of the stall raised his head and blew a clot of mashed up, lumpy grain on to his jacket, a tall British Warmblood with a striking, chestnut coat. Kian made a face and rubbed at the mess, smearing the brown stain further into his coat as he tried and failed to remove it.

“Thanks for that. I suppose that’s your way of saying ‘thank you’ for your breakfast then, is it?”

He let himself into the stall, patting the alert stallion on the neck. As he talked, the equine’s ears twitched back and forth, catching every noise with the delicacy that only a prey animal could manage.

“That’ll be okay though, let’s get you out, if you’ve finished your grub then, hey?” He chuckled and slipped a red head collar over the horse’s nose. “Got to get on with the day, haven’t we?”

Leading the stallion out, he tied him to an O-ring outside the stall and grumbled to himself as he wheeled the barrow inside, fork and shovel clattering against its metal whim. In the rafters, a robin chirped and he whistled back automatically, smiling when the bird flitted down lower with an answering warble of song. He may have to start the day with mucking out, but at least he had a bit of company. Life as a stable lad was not so bad, after all, he had to say, even if he didn’t quite get the respect he deserved as head stable lad.

Frowning, Kian tried to concentrate on shovelling dirtied straw and droppings into the barrow, yet unwelcome thoughts crept in, unwelcome with their cold, dark tendrils. He’d been working on the yard the longest – since he was sixteen and just volunteering his services for experience, in fact – but respect was hard-won in the equine world. Just as he thought the younger workers were coming around to look to him as a stand in for the yard owner when she was away, one of the older workers neatly stepped in to undermine him and deplete every ounce of his hard work.

Kian’s hands tightened on the fork and he set his jaw into a hard, quivering line. Every single fucking time! He swore they had a sixth sense to tell just when everything was going swimmingly, knowing exactly when to jump in and wreck all the time and effort he had spent on developing himself as someone in the know.

He sighed. Was he even in the know? Did he have enough knowledge of working on the yard to really be the head stable lad? The chestnut horse snorted at him, peering around the door as if he had something far more interesting in his stable than horse nuggets and stained straw.

“I’ve not got nothing for you,” he said, not pausing in his work. “So, you’re better off waiting to be kicked out for the day. I haven’t got the time to do that too if I’m to get all of these clean.”

He shook his head. He shouldn’t have had to do it all on his own. But it wasn’t as if he was the only one scheduled that day, not by a long shot. While Susan wasn’t due until midday – she'd done well enough and made sure to let him know in advance – one unshaven face should have been there at the same time as him, if not before.

Kian scowled and clanged the fork against the wheelbarrow, hurling in droppings with far more force than was necessary for the task. He looked to his wrist for his watch, finding only a white line slashed through his fading tan, summer lingering on his skin even as he shivered. He swore at the wall. Great. One more problem. Just where the hell had that gotten to?

The gloom of the barn – he had not bothered to turn on the overhead lights, letting the weak sunshine do the work of electricity – soothed his frazzled mind and he exhaled softly. The scrape of fork and shovel in perfect rhythm, a beat of his own choosing, calmed the wound up corners of his mind and his lips slowly but surely broke into a smile as he worked. Quickly, he emptied the first stall of waste and stood back to survey his work, sweat gleaming on his brow as he started to heat up at last. It was worth it though, just for that sliver of peace in his day.

If only that peace had not been destined to be shattered.

“Morning!”

Kian straightened, blinking into the bright light pouring through the barn door. It swung wide thumping off the wall and juddering back, swinging as the wind played with the oversized toy on its hinges. He winced and shook his head as Dexter strode in with his hands thrust into his pockets, a brilliantly white grin plastered across his face. The older man ran his hand back as if to take it through thicker strands of hair, yet only found short, bristly growth, black stubble prickling. Kian had to suppress a smile, teeth digging into the inside of his cheek. He couldn't say it wasn't funny when the man forgot

“You're late.”

Dexter widened his eyes and spread his hands out imploringly wide, the very picture of innocence.

“I had a late one, alright? C'mon, surely you're not going to go on at me for being late just the one time?”

Kian laughed, although there wasn't anything funny about the situation and his eyes narrowed, blue eyes as sharp as chips of ice broken up by an equine hoof.

“One time? This is the third time this week and...” He paused, collecting his thoughts. “And it's Thursday. If you think that's just one time, mate, you have bigger problems.”

He scowled and shook his head, Dexter rolling his shoulders in a shrug that contained no sense of responsibility. What did he expect, really? The bloke was always the same. Anger flickered to life in the pit of Kian's stomach and he clenched his hand into a fist, thrusting it deep into his pocket so the older man wouldn't see how it shook.

Dexter grinned and dumped his bag on the floor in the middle of the centre aisle, striding away even as he threw back his answer.

“Oh, get off, we get by, don’t we?”

“That’s not the point!”

“Then what is?” Dexter glanced back, shaking his head. “Haven’t we got horses to do? What have you been doing all this time? You’ve only cleaned one stable.” He smirked and tapped his finger against the side of his nose. “Did you get in late too? Is that why you’re suddenly so hung up on me, hey?”

Kian gaped and threw his hands up in the air, refusing to dignify that with an answer. What did he have to bloody answer for? Swallowing hard, he deliberately picked up his fork and turned his back on Dexter, returning to his work with an air of determination. He focused on tidying the pile in the barrow, only then turning and thrusting the handles into Dexter’s hands, which clenched around the handles automatically.

Dexter’s face twisted into a contorted expression that Kian couldn’t hope to read and didn’t care to. The man would have been handsome if not for his attitude and Kian looked him up and down, gaze brushing over his muscled arms, bare in his t-shirt. How did the bloke even manage with the cold? He shook his head slightly and caught himself as Dexter tossed him a glare, rubbing the back of his hand over the short, bristly beard that clung to his chin. Stepping back, Kian nodded, covering his momentary lapse. But what would it be like...

Eh, he wasn’t Kian’s type anyway. He mentally shrugged him off and didn’t finish the thought, though there was a pink tinge to the insides of his ears that hadn’t been there before.

“We’d have more of them done if you’d been here on time,” Kian said, already looking to the next stall. “Take this to the muck heap, then turn the lot of them out – the usual fields. They need a good stretch in their legs this morning.”

Dexter eyed him levelly.

“Sure thing...boss.”

Though the title was intended to sting, Kian grinned with his back to Dexter, hearing only the bump and rattle of the wheelbarrow being taken away.

I’ll count that round mine and won, thank you.

In similar form to the first, Kian released the next stallion from the confines of his stall, fork in hand and eyes on the mess of straw within. Only compromised of eight stables, the barn would not take long to muck out, but there would still be the resident mares on the outdoor block of stables to deal with, used to having their breakfast at a later time. He’d learned early on that the stallions did not stand half as well for waiting than the mares, who had no direct view of the feed room.

As he worked, Dexter returned, taking longer than should have been strictly necessary to run to the muck heap and back, and dumped the barrow behind Kian. Not looking up, Kian waited and grinned triumphantly to himself as the older man quietly took the first two stallions – one lead rope in each hand – from the barn, jogging and cursing as they pranced. The chestnut stallion bobbed his head and danced on the end of the lead rope like it was going to snake up and bite him, head high and nostrils flared. Kian laughed quietly to himself. Boy, he sure was feeling the day, all right! Dexter would have his work cut out for him. And that wasn't a bad thing by any stretch of the imagination – not by far!

Dexter huffed, stomping back into the barn with two lead ropes slung over his shoulder.

“After you’ve turned them out,” Kian interrupted his huff, “go up and feed the mares. And put them in the opposite paddock.” He surveyed the stalls. “I’ll blast through this lot and we can get on with the rest of the day. Sound okay?”

He didn't know why he asked, but it seemed polite to do so. Dexter scowled and didn't answer, hunching his shoulders. Kian rolled his eyes. He couldn't imagine being so bloody miserable day in and day out, in all honesty. There had to be something wrong with that man – truly, there did. And, where his own authority came into question, well, he'd just have to believe he'd get there sooner or later. He sighed, hiding his frown. He'd have to.

To his surprise, Dexter stomped through the remainder of the turning out without vocal complaint and disappeared back to the outdoor stable block without saying a single word more. Kian, on his fourth stall by the time all the stallions, bar one antisocial fellow who was to go out separately, were turned out.

“You okay there, fella?” He paused in his work to rub the flat of the stallion's head, down from his ears to the curve of his nose. “You not too lonely in here?”

Silver eyed him and blew warm air into his palm. Chuckling, Kian took up his fork again, his ‘weapon’ of choice that would get him through the day. Or at least the mucking out.

“You’re a funny one, you are. Any of the others would be screaming to go out at least near the other boys if they were left on their own in here.” He cast the stallion a look. “But not you. You like your peace too, don't you boy?”

Snorting, Silver ducked away and shoved his nose into his water bucket, sucking up gulp after gulp of water. Kian pursed his lips and peered into the stall, shedding his jacket. That would need filling up too – the stallion as a thirsty bugger. He slid the bolt back in the door and was halfway through the motion of opening the stall door when a clatter of hooves and a squeal rudely announced themselves.

Silver's head whipped around as the piebald mare, her coat a splashing of black and white, trotted into the barn with a too familiar face at her side. Kian stood stock still for a second, mind struggling to comprehend the idiocy of what he was seeing as his heartbeat rocketed to a breakneck pace. Dexter stood on the other side of the mare, jogging as she kept her body neatly and proudly between him and the stallion, door still in the process of swinging further and further open.

Air rushed into Kian's lungs.

“What the fuck do you think you're doing?”

Slamming his back into the door just in time, Kian sweated and rammed the bolt home as the stallion's chest smacked into it. He threw his head high and neighed to the passing mare, flirting with her tail flagged and pushed to the side. Spinning in his stall, he lunged over the door, nearly taking a chunk out of Kian's arm as he swore and dodged, struggling to grind the stiff bottom bolt across. Not that it would help if the bloody horse really was dead set on getting out!

"Haven't you seen her move?" Dexter yelled, panting as he kept pace with the springy-gaited mare. "Got to get her to the field, haven't I?"

Kian gaped and held up his hands.

"And you thought the best way to get her there would be to take her through here?"

Dexter smirked, tossing a glance back over his shoulder as he reached the other door, lead rope held loosely – too loosely – in his hands. He blinked, eyebrows raised, but could not keep the smug grin from his lips.

"Shouldn't I have done that, boss?"

"Just get her the hell out of here." Kian's head pounded. "Now!"

Dexter whistled as he led the mare from the barn at last, but the damage had already been done. Silver wheeled and whipped around his stall, kicking up straw and staring over the door with his eyes bulging for the mare. Kian swore, one curse blending into the next until his words became one long string of unpleasant mutters, cursing Dexter and every step he placed on the earth. The man would have caused less harm if he'd clocked him one across the jaw rather than wind up a stallion known to be...well...a bit unrulier than most. It was why he didn't really get on with other horses, the oddball grey.

But he had a stallion to calm. His brow furrowed, eyes creasing worriedly at the corners. Dexter would just have to wait.

"Easy now, boy," he murmured, voice rising in pitch even as he tried to keep it as even and steady as possible. "Easy now... Don't want you to be getting too excited now, do we? Take it easy, boy, steady now..."

The stallion snorted and pawed the straw, throwing his head up and swinging his hindquarters towards Kian as if to crush him against the dividing wall. Cursing, Kian dodged and hung on to Silver's head collar for dear life as the stallion pranced and snorted, tail flagged as if that would be enough to bring the mare back to him. There was nothing malicious in his actions and Kian rubbed his withers, pinching lightly with his fingertips in mimicry of an equine grooming partner.

Slowly, Silver lowered his head, bottom lip quivering as he unwillingly subjected himself to the attention. As pleasant as it was, it was not what he truly wanted, as testified by the thick length of horse meat slapping the underside of his belly. Kian sighed and kept up his scratches, voice a low, soothing croon that brought the stallion back to some semblance of control. He was not all that badly behaved, not really. He was a good boy, a good horse. He just wanted the mare. All would have been fine if not for the mare!

Kian growled mentally, expression outwardly calm. Damn him! Just what the hell had Dexter been thinking, leading a mare in season down the bloody centre aisle? He was lucky that only Silver had been in to begin with! Or else the whole stable would be crying out for a mare that was not for them! He frowned and patted the grey stallion's neck, fingers rubbing in soothing circles. That none of the other stallions had been worked up didn't help Silver's situation though. It didn't help him one bit.

The stallion blew hot air over Kian's arm, a loud slapping announcing – though it did not need such – the presence of his cock, still hard and dropped from its wrinkled, leathery sheath. A mess of pick and dark grey splotches, it bounced as the stallion flexed his muscles, rocking it up to his flesh in what little masturbation an equine could manage. His balls – oh how Kian had tried to ignore his balls – swelled heavy behind his sheath, their size evidencing exactly why he was the best breeding stud on the farm.

Scraping a hoof through the straw, the stallion snorted in Kian's face and cast him a look: well?

Dragging his eyes away, Kian bit his lip, heartbeat quickening as his palms sweated. The barn owner would have a fit and a half if she came back from the show to find Silver in such a state – her prize stallion! As if to confirm his fears, perfectly on cue, Silver tossed his head and let loose a piercing whinny that had Kian swearing and clapping his hands over his ears, releasing the head collar.

With a squeal, the stallion swung around the stallion, forcing Kian up against the door, heart hammering in his chest as he murmured to the stallion, tone slipping further and further from soothing. Although he seemed careful to avoid the human in his stall, the equine's nostrils flared, cock slapping and bobbing with a single sole intent.

Kian gulped, flattening himself against the door with his heart pounding. Silver tossed his head, upper lip flapping as he grunted, a sense of urgency in the ach of his neck. Swallowing again – why was his mouth suddenly so dry? – Kian lifted a trembling hand to the stallion's muzzle, letting him blow hot air into his palm.

Was there...something he could do to help the stud?

As if it was only a matter of time until his thoughts veered off in such a direction, Kian's eyes dropped to the equine's shaft. He gulped, unconsciously pressing his thighs together as if he could conceal his own inadequacy in the stallion's presence. There wasn't a man alive that could live up to that! Or would want to, if he was completely honest with himself. That sort of size was all well and good for horses, but would send a lady running for the hills!

He chuckled, relieved that he still had some sense of humour as his thoughts spiralled further and further out of control. For, as much as he struggled to grab for them, they slipped beyond his grasp, taunting him with images that made his cheeks burn.

As if in a dream, he moved slowly to the stallion's side, running his hand down the crest of his neck to his withers. Silver snorted and tossed his head, flicking up flakes of straw as he bobbed his muzzle, an urgency in the flag of his tail. Kian swallowed. Hard. How long had it been since the stallion had last been with a mare? Weeks? He cast his mind back, searching for a time that would not come to the forefront of his mind. Shaking his head, he scratched the horse's withers, though he was not to be soothed by a grooming partner. No wonder he was wound up after just having a single mare strut past his stall if he had been so long without when all the other stallions were called on to used the breeding dummy and run with mares brought in from outside breeders.

Silver nipped Kian's arm and shot him a look, ears back, that seemed to be telling him to get the hell on with it. Kian's heart pounded and he slid his gaze away, blood roaring in his ears. Get on with what? He had nothing to give the stallion. Could he chance running out for the breeding aid? A sleeve that a stallion could thrust into for the collection of semen?

He didn't want to admit that his heart sank at the notion that there may yet be another option to the thought pushing its way to the very front of his mind. The stallion's cock swayed beneath his stomach as he turned his body side on to 'his' stable boy, head tilted arrogantly.

Well?

Kian glanced out the barn door, seeing nothing but bright daylight. Something in the back of his mind told him that he should dash out and close it, but Silver whinnied shrilly, lifting his front hooves a couple of threatening inches from the floor, and he hurriedly pressed himself back to the equine's side.

Nope. The door would have to stay open.

Dexter would be a while yet, he reasoned with himself, dropping to his knees in the straw as the stallion stepped closer, hooves shuffling through the deep bed of straw. Thick enough to protect his clothes from the underlying layer of moisture, it cushioned his knees as he spread them apart, sliding his hand up Silver's leg from his fetlock to where his hind leg joined with the bulk of his body. Heat rose from the bed and he sighed softly, tension unknitting in the line of his shoulders, nestling into the heat of the stud as he hid from the outside world.

Sometimes, time spent with the horses was time better spent. He smiled, stroking the stallion's flank and scratching lightly over his skin through his thin, gleaming coat. No, that was a lie. It would always be better time than any nuance of reality in the company of another human being. That was why he so delighted in his little dalliances away from harsh reality.

Silver stomped and snorted as he hushed the equine gently, a soothing murmur rolling from his lips like water burbling over rocks in a mountain creek. He trailed his hand, inevitably, beneath the horse's stomach and cupped his balls, letting their weight sink into his palm. Biting his lip, he stifled a groan. Were they heavier than before? Oh, it had been so long and he had been so busy, so very busy... Too busy to look after his favourite stud.

"I'll take care of you, boy, don't you worry," he whispered, tickling the stallion's sheath with his fingertips. "It'll be all right, boy, just you relax now, hey?"

The stallion raised a front hoof and huffed as Kian caressed his sheath, reuniting himself with the soft folds of skin, to the opening where the slick, long length pushed out. Licking his lips, he wrapped his hands around it and dragged them smoothly all the way to the tip, the flat head drooling a clear stream of pre cum.

He couldn't resist. Leaning in, he swiped his tongue over the tip, groaning as the slick treat passed between his lips. He couldn't say it was salty – that would be too far, too cliché – but it emanated maleness, equine musk spilling from his tongue and pooling around his teeth. He swallowed, eyes rolling back into his head, and took another lap, this time swirling his tongue around the shaft as he kissed the head. Silver grunted, sides trembling, and Kian swallowed repeatedly as a thicker stream of fluid poured into his mouth.

He held back his moan, chest tight, and lapped over the soft, spongy flesh, sinking further and further from reality as he had done so many times before. The stallion's rounded belly pressed to the top of his head, muscle and power sending a teasing thrill through his body. It was perfect, it couldn't have been more perfect. Just him and Silver. Kian slurped down the shaft, more and more pre cum flooding his mouth. Yes, it was perfect, irrefutably so. For, in that moment, nothing else existed in his world but his time with the stallion.

He closed his eyes, revelling in the moment. He'd forgotten how over productive stallions could be, not that you'd hear him complaining – oh no. Kian moaned around the tip of the stallion's cock, feeling it pulse and shift in his mouth as the stallion tried to flex it up against his belly, seeking more stimulation than Kian was currently providing. But Kian had to take his fill too.

Rubbing the stallion's heavy balls with his thumbs, he rolled them softly against his palms, suckling on the tip of his shaft like it was a treat that he wished to devour. Yet, in all honesty, it was a very different kind of devouring that Kian desired. He shivered, playing his tongue across the slit at the tip of his shaft, letting it bow down slightly to his lips as the equine shifted his weight back and forth, back and forth, never still for more than a heartbeat. He chuckled softly – the sound muffled – around the cock resting between his lips and lifted it in his palm, kissing down the length to the equine's balls.

Pressing his face into the musky sack, he inhaled deeply, suppressing his groan with willpower he had not even known he possessed. It was not that the stallion had not been bathed or groomed in a while, but something far more primal that made his own cock harden in his stable jeans, begging for release. He flicked out his tongue and lapped softly over every inch of the stallion's nuts, leaving no spot untouched as he lavished the attention the equine truly deserved upon him. No, Silver didn't deserve to be cooped up in a stall! Kian parted his lips as far apart as he could and slurped one ball into his mouth, heart leaping at the stallion's nicker, head stretched out and lip flapping contentedly. No, he would just have to give the equine exactly what he deserved and more, even if he could not be satisfied.

Not today, at least.

A patch of moisture seeped through Kian's underwear, cool against his bare flesh trapped in the confines of clothing, and he blushed, lapping and kissing up the full length as he massaged the stallion's balls. He wouldn't get that treatment from a mare! Kian flushed with pride, saliva dripping down his chin as he suckled and kissed the increasingly slippery shaft, shifting against his face as if the stallion wished to thrust and drive forward as instinct bid him to do. Kian shivered. He wouldn't mind being Silver's mare either, not one bit. Feeling that fat cock slide into him... He moaned.

But Silver shared no such fantasies, only the immediacies of carnal pleasure and breeding instinct. Giving a quiet squeal, his tail flicked, striking the wall.

Get on with it!

“All right, all right...”

Kian chuckled, pausing as he dragged breath into his lungs. Had he forgotten to breathe? Really? He puffed his cheeks out, a rosy tinge brightening the tops of his ears. He hadn't gotten so caught up in giving pleasure since...well...

Kian shook his head, a smile on his face as he pumped the length of the stallion's cock between two hands.

“You haven't got all day, I know. Neither do I, not really.”

That didn't stop him wishing he had all day to spend with the stallion, however, and Kian relished every moment as he parted his lips as far as they would go and took Silver's cock-head into his mouth. Gulping, he squeezed the equine's balls lightly as he stomped and shifted as if to thrust in, reminding Silver without words that he was not quite like the mares he so wanted to breed. The stallion couldn't squeal and prance and thrust, taking his fill of a mare who would flick her ears and present her rump for more – if she so pleased, that was. Kian's eyes watered, cock nuzzled up to the back of his throat. No, he was a little more breakable than a mare. If the stallion couldn't remember that, he sure as hell would have to.

He groaned, lapping up the underside of the stallion's shaft until he reached Silver's balls. As his fingers pumped the length, mimicking how the equine would thrust into a mare, he sucked in a deep breath, locking all of the stallion's musk into his lungs that he possibly could. Straw scratched his legs, but he couldn't find it in himself to care, hips bucking and cock achingly hard as he sought for relief that could not yet come. Pushing his hands all the way down to his sheath before drawing them back up, he let pre cum drip to the straw, pooling in the bedding as Silver flicked his tail over and over again, wanting every drop of pleasure Kian had to give.

But he wouldn't have to wait long to reach his peak, being an equine. Alas, stallions did not last long when it came to a dirty romp and instinct drove Silver to rock his hindquarters, seeking that pinnacle of pleasure that would continue his line. Dizzy with the scent of hay and stallion, Kian pushed his face up into the equine's balls and drew in a deep breath, hands moving quicker and quicker as he gave himself up entirely to the moment at hand.

The stallion lifted a hind hoof, a whinny building as he flagged his tail, balancing on the brink of an explosive climax that Kian was all too familiar with. He shivered, tensing in anticipation, lips sliding up to the tip, flaring out wider and wider. The stallion threw his head up and squealed, balls swinging gently into Kian's waiting palm as he stroked the length until his fingers cramped.

Kian was ready.

Latching his lips around the cock-tip just in time, Kian's eyes shot wide as the first pulse of stallion semen burst on to his tongue. Flooding forth in thick, heady spurts, it filled his mouth and he gulped rapidly, unable to keep up with the deluge. Spluttering, he held his cock to his lips and swallowed as much as he could, though trickles still escaped from the corners of his lips. Eyes watering, he locked his lips around the flare and drew it as far back into his mouth as he could, letting the stallion shoot his load straight down his throat.

Nickering, Silver arched his neck and slammed a hoof into the straw, the stream slowly tapering off as Kian pulled back, stallion seed dripping from his lips as he gulped for lost breath. Silver snorted as Kian ran his hand lovingly down the softening length to the sheath, fingertips trailing over the stallion's balls. As his cock drooped down under its own weight, losing the lustful tension that made it a breeding pole to rival any stud on the farm, the stallion bobbed his muzzle and returned to his hay net, ears drooping softly.

Kian groaned, bringing his hands up to the slick mess of cum oozing down his face and threatening to drip on to his jacket. He'd forgotten the after effects, so to speak, though – if given the chance – he would do it all over again just for a few moments of having the horse's cock sealed sweetly between his lips. He smiled, lips twitching up higher and higher as he giggled like a drunkard to himself, ducking back as the stallion stepped away, done with him for the time being.

Wiping his chin, he only managed to spread the mess further across his face and groaned even as he smiled, unable to keep the grin from his face. Yes, stallions were indeed rather over productive, but that wasn't always a bad thing. He licked his lips, languishing in the taste of stallion, and sucked it from his fingers with a moan that was louder than intended, echoing down the centre aisle of the barn. Luckily for him, there was no one there to hear him and his interlude passed unnoticed.

Brushing off his jeans, he scrambled shakily to his feet and dropped a kiss on the stallion's nose. Wrinkling his muzzle, Silver snorted

“Oh, done with me now, are you? No kiss for me today?”

Puckering up his lips, Kian laughed and slung his arm around the stallion's neck, peppering his cheek in sloppy kisses until the equine dipped his head and, admittedly with a weary look in his eye, grudgingly accepted the attention. Kian chuckled and scratched his ears, wiping off the worst of the stallion cum with the sleeve of his jacket, yanking it off as he did so. He wrinkled his nose and tried to ignore the stain, cheeks pink. That could be washed, but he was acutely aware of the need to hide the evidence until he left the stable yard at the tail end of the day.

Yet even the mundane could not spoil his mood. He grinned and blew the stallion a kiss, a bounce in his step as he ducked from the stall and left Silver picking hay peacefully from his hay net, no longer worrying about satisfying his needs. Everything was fine and he wouldn't be spinning like a lunatic around his stall anymore either – bonus!

Stepping into the crisp morning, Kian sucked in a deep breath, lungs expanding until he thought they would burst. Up by the stable block for the mares, Dexter swore and chased after a palomino with her tail flicked up, a lead rope trailing uselessly from her head collar. Putting his hands on his lips, Kian threw his head back and laughed, cheeks rosy. Nothing could dampen his mood!

And, next time, he would be the stud's mare.